PREFACE

When I took this work in hands, in the winter of 1910, very little bardic poetry had been published; still less had been edited or translated with any measure of accuracy. The delay in completing the work, due to various causes, personal and other, has had a beneficial effect, inasmuch as it has given the editor the opportunity of utilizing the valuable contributions to our knowledge of Irish poetry made by E. C. Quiggin in his Prolegomena to the study of the later Irish bards, by Kuno Meyer in his papers on the subject in Ériu, by Professor Osborn Bergin in his editions of bardic verse in Ériu, The Irish Review, Studies etc., his papers on Irish prosody in Ériu, his lectures on bardic poetry at The School of Irish Learning, and his edition, still in progress, of the Irish Grammatical Tracts; by Professor T. F. O'Rahilly in his Dánta Grádha. The Rev. L. MacKenna's editions of the religious poems attributed to Aonghus Ó Dálaigh and others must also be mentioned. These have all appeared in recent years, and the advantage I have derived from them in editing Tadhg Dall's poems cannot be over-estimated.

I have also to acknowledge my debt to work earlier than any of these, that of the accomplished and uniquely gifted Irish scholar to whose memory I have ventured to dedicate this editio princeps of the collected poems of "the mellifluous Teigue Dall", Standish Hayes O'Grady. In his Catalogue of Irish MSS. in the British Museum O'Grady published selections of Irish poetry of various periods, including a number of passages from the poems of Tadhg Dall; these selections are accompanied by translations so remarkably felicitous, and on the whole so accurate, that one knows not which to admire most, the insight which grasps the significance of the original, or the marvellous mastery of the resources of the English language shown in the rendering.

The method I have followed in editing the poems is described in Section 8 of the Introduction. I cannot claim that the work is free from inconsistencies, or that I have successfully solved every difficulty, but I believe the critical apparatus is sufficiently complete to safeguard the student from any errors of judgment I may have committed in normalization, or in selecting from different readings; and that all doubtful renderings are pointed out as such, either in text or Notes.

While accepting full responsibility for any faults of commission or omission which may be found in these volumes, I wish to record here my obligations to my teacher at the School of Irish Learning, Professor Osborn Bergin, for the generous assistance which I have received from him throughout the preparation of the work. Professor Bergin not alone furnished me with many notes and transcriptions, but read through the text and translation of the great majority of the poems in typescript, making many corrections and emendations, and to his sound judgment and unrivalled knowledge of the subject the work owes more than can be briefly expressed. I must also acknowledge the valuable help I have received from Mr. R. I. Best, Litt. D., whose learned and constructive criticism has saved me from many blunders. From Professor T. F. O'Rahilly I have received a number of useful notes and references, and my obligation to Professor Eóin MacNeill is shown infra p. xx.

I am indebted to Professor John Fraser, Jesus College, Oxford, for supplying me with a transcript from a Bodleian MS.; to Professor Edmund Curtis for information about oral traditions regarding Tadhg Dall in Donegal, and to the Very Rev. Charles Gildea for kindly answering my queries as to traditions in Kilmactigue parish.

It remains for me to express my thanks to the Council and officials of the Royal Irish Academy, the Librarians of Trinity College, Dublin, the Franciscan Convent, Dublin, the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh, and the officials of the Public Record Office, Dublin, for the courtesy with which they have accorded me all necessary facilities for consulting the manuscripts in their charge, I wish moreover to express my thanks to the Printers for the accuracy and intelligence with which they have performed their work.

E. K.

INTRODUCTION

TADHG DALL Ó HUIGINN

The small amount of information I am able to retail about the poet himself is based on the following documentary evidence¹:

1 We have manuscript copies of upwards of forty poems ascribed to Tadhg Dall, each titled copy bearing one of the following superscriptions: — Tadhg Dall Ó Huiginn .cc. (i. e. composed by T. D. Ó H.), Tadhg Dall mc Mathghamhna Uí Uiginn .cc., Tadhg Dall mc Mathghamhna .cc., Tadhg Dall .cc. Only five or six of these manuscripts were written before 1650, only two before 1600.² The poems are addressed to individuals who flourished during the period 1560-1590.

2 In several Exchequer Inquisitions taken at Sligo during March 1584 Tege Dall O Higgen de Dughorne (for variations in spelling see Wood-Martin's Hist. of Sligo, App. C) is given as one of the jurors.

3 In an Exch. Inquisition taken at Sligo, July 27, 1590, the jury included Thadeus O Higgin de Cowlerecoll.

4 In an Exch. Inqu. taken at Sligo, July 27, 1590, it was testified that Matheus O Higyn of Dougharane, in the barony of Leyney, Co. Sligo, died on January 9, 1585, and that Tadeus, commonly called Teg dall O Higyn, aged at the time of the inquiry forty years, and married, was his nearest and legitimate heir.³

¹ Probably more definite information on some points will be available when the Anglo-Irish official documents of the 16th cent. are fully calendered. It is particularly regrettable that the Connacht Inquisitions for this period are not in print.

² See § 7.

³ Transcriptions of the Inquisitions cited, so far as the originals are legible, will appear in the Appendix at the end of Vol. ii.

5 In an Exch. Inquisition taken at Ballymote, Co. Sligo, January 12, 1593, it was testified that Thadeus, alias Teage Dall O Higgen, late of Cowlrecoyll, in the aforesaid county, generosus, died at Cowlrecoyll on the last day of March, 1591, and that Thadeus oge mc Teage O Higgen, at the time of his father's death nine years of age, and unmarried, was his legitimate son and nearest heir.¹

6 In a Chancery Inquisition taken at Sligo, June 30, 1617, Teige Oge O Higgen being one of the jurors, it was testified that "William mc Corcshell and Owen O Hara of Castlecarragh were attainted of murdering one Teige Dall O Higgen his wife and childe in the yeare one thousand five hundred ninetee and one or thereabouts . . . that one Tomoltagh O'Hara . . . was killed in actuall rebellion anno Dni. 1590 or thereabouts . . . that Brian O'Hara, Art O'Hara and Donnell O'Hara were likewise attainted of the aforesaid murder the yeare of God one thousand five hundred ninetee and one." In estimating the value of this inquisition as evidence we must remember that the object of the inquiry was to ascertain the validity of whatever claims might be made in 1617 to the ownership of the lands held by these O'Haras before their attainure. The important point was that the claims of these six had been legally forfeited, the reference to Tadhg Dall being merely incidental.² It is also to be noted that the language is ambiguous; "T. D. O H. his wife and childe" could mean simply "the wife and child of T. D. O'H". The attainure of Art, Edmund (a misrendering of Eóghan = Owen?), Brian and Donnell O'Hara is referred to in a Fiant of 1594 (Eliz. No. 5865), but the nature of their offence is not mentioned. The only other evidence I have found bearing on the alleged murder is:—

² Similarly the inquisition on Tadhg Dall's own lands in 1593 does not record the manner of his death; that would only be of interest if he had perished 'in actuall rebellion,' in which case his lands might have been forfeit. Therefore the silence of this inquisition on the point is no evidence

7 a copy of the satire on the six robbers (44) written in 1714 by Muiris Ó Nuabha (Gad. I, 160-1) with the heading: Ag so in aoir do-rinnigh Tadhg Dall Ó Huiginn dona daoinibh da Mhuintir Eadhra fát bheanadar a theangaigh as et cetera 'This is the satire which Tadhg Dall Ó Huiginn composed on the people of the O'Hara family, for which they cut out his tongue etc.' Further references bearing on the identity of the poet are:

8 In RIA 23 F 16, written by a native of Sligo in 1656, the stanzas beginning: A fír threabhas in tulaigh are followed by the note: Asé Maol Muire Úa Huiginn i. dearbrathair Thaidhg Dhaill adubhairt na tri rainn . do bhi'n'ardeaspoc Tuama 7 fuair bás ar ttilleadh ón Róimh a nAnuorb san Tír Íeachtuir 'Maol Muire Ó Huiginn, Tadhg Dal's own brother, pronounced these three stanzas, he who was archbishop of Tuam, and died after returning from Rome, in Antwerp, in the Netherlands.'¹

In RIA A IV 3, 697, the stanzas beginning A fír théid go fiadh bfuinidh are headed Maol Muire mc Mathghamhna² Í Uiginn.

9 Finally, we have the following references in 17th century poems³:

Oidhidh Thaidhg duansgagtha Doill, éag Eochaidh mheic Maoil Eachloinn, tug draoithe Éirionn fa oil, géibhionn maoithe fa mheanmoin.

that he was not murdered. As to the general purpose of inquisitions see preface to Cal. Pat. and Close Rolls Hen. VIII—Eliz., Vol. I p. xxxiv.

² O'Grady errs in describing either of the brothers as 'son of Cairbre' (Cat. 439, 442). The heading prefixed to his edn. of 44 is not that of the MS., which has simply Tadhg Dall Ó Higin cc.

³ For a ref. by a contemporary poet see Notes to 39.

'The destruction of Tadhg Dall, refiner of poems, the death of Eochaidh, son of Maol Eachloinn (Ó Heódhusa), have brought the sages of Banbha into contempt, and enchained the spirit in dejection.'

This is from the piece beginning Tairnicc tigse fuinn Ghaoidheal, ascribed in some copies to Ó Gnímh, in the Book of O'Conor Don to one Aonghus Ó Dálaigh. The reference to Eochaidh Ó Heódhusa shows that it was composed after that poet's death in 1613. The word oidhidh (O. Ir. aided, later oidhidh fem. or oidheadh masc.) generally signifies a death by violence, accident, poison, plague, or sudden sickness of any kind — a sudden death, in short. Thus this reference supports, though not decisively, the story of the murder.

There are some obscure references to Tadhg Dall in a curious bardic controversy, imperfectly preserved in the Book of Clanranald, between Niall Mhac Mhuireadhaigh (fl. c. 1700), Diarmaid son of Laoiseach Mhac an Bhaird (fl. c. 1690), Eóghan Ó Donnaoile, and one Cormac, whose surname does not appear. The four¹ poems of the controversy are printed in Reliquiae Celticae II 291 ff. The text as printed is very corrupt; I have not seen the MS. In the following citations I have normalized the spelling somewhat, in order to render the lines more intelligible. In the first piece, Diarmaid reproaches Cormac for attempting to rob the Ulster arms of Lámh Dhearg Éireann 'The Red Hand of Ireland,' proven in annals and poems to be the special property of the race of Íor:—

*Seandán fire ar a bhfuil dath, Lámh Dhearg Éireann íbh Eathach, do-rinn on t-oide glan grinn,
ná ben re hoige I Uiginn.*

'An ancient truthful poem of good credibility, "Iveagh² is the Red Hand of Ireland", did the bright, witty poet compose; do not tamper with the work of Ó Huiginn.'

Eóghan, in reply, disparages the poem mentioned, and is followed by Niall, whose poem contains the lines:—

² i. e. the descendants of Eochu, here the Magennis of Down.

Tuigim a diagrann Tadhg Dall [d']Íbh Eathach Duibhléin, dearbham, ge bé léaghfadh a lorg linn ní séanfadh ord Í Uiginn.

'I understand what Tadhg Dall claims for (?) the race of Eochu Doimlén; whosoever should read his stave (?) with us would not reject Ó Huiginn's arrangement (?)'

The next poem is also by Niall, I cite the stanza with which we are concerned as spelt in Rel. Celt.:—

Ni derbhadh let ar laimh dheirg dán dírech Taodg i huiginn sgo cuirfet anaon chelhram cam ne cuirfedh táodg sa leathrann

I give here¹ Professor Bergin's translation of these obscure lines: "You hold that the straight verse of Tadhg O Huiginn is no authority concerning the Red Hand—I will put into a single crooked line more than Tadhg would into half a quatrain."

These references are principally interesting as showing that at the dawn of the 18th century, a hundred years after his death, Tadhg Dall was such a vivid memory that a mere mention of the name of Ó Huiginn, without further definition, was taken as a reference to him. For the piece discussed by these controversialists, Lámh Dhearg Éireann Íbh Eathach, was not composed by Tadhg Dall. It is addressed to a chief who flourished late in the 14th century or early in the 15th,² and is usually ascribed in the mss. to Maol Seachluinn (or Maoil Eachluinn³) na nUirsgéal Ó Huiginn, (fl. c. 1420).⁴ In an elegy

² O'Grady, Cat. 395, wrongly identifies the chief addressed as "Sir Hugh mac Donall Oge." In the last stanza he is described as Art, son of Aodh, son of Art. According to O'Clery's Genealogies the great grandfather of 'Donall Oge' was Art, son of Aedh, son of Art na madhmann.

³ I do not know which form would be correct for the period. The second is common in MS. headings, but O'Clery uses the first in his genealogies for all periods.

⁴ For other ascriptions see O'Grady, l. c., and Ériu 8, 89.

on Saerbhreathach Mac Carrthaigh, Tighearna Chnuic Caisil,¹ by Diarmaid, son of Seán Buidhe Mac Carrthaigh († 1705), Tadhg Dall is mentioned amongst the great bards of bygone days whose verses would have had a worthy subject in the dead chief:

*Ó Dálaigh is gach fáidh dá phóraibh,
Ó Duinnín 'sa bhfuil díobh beó aguinn, Tadhg Dall isa bhfuil ann da sórtsan is Maol Domhnaigh rug geall leis i gcomhdaibh.*

Dámhscol Mhic an Bhaird na gcomhfocal, Ó Maol Conaire an t-oide, is Ó Heóghusa, Clann Dáire, na fáidhe ba mhó aguinn, is Clann Chraith aga raibh ceart gach éoluis.

'O'Daly, and every sage of his kin, O'Dinneen, and all that remain of them, Tadhg Dall, and those of his like, and Maol Domhnaigh, who excelled in verses.

The bardic school of Mac an Bhaird of the compounds, O'Mulconry the teacher, and O'Hussey; the sons of Dáire, the sages that we honoured so greatly, the Magraths exact in every science.'²

The following reference to the birth of Tadhg Dall's daughter, in a note added in the Dublin copy of the Annals of Loch Cé, after the entries for 1496,³ is obviously corrupt, in view of the documentary evidence cited above relating to the date of his death. The note was originally written in a fine, light hand, ink very yellow; the writing has been gone over more recently in black. The hand in general style resembles that of David O'Duigenan:

Kl. Enair 1599. Ben Mhumhan Og ni Dhuibhghennain inghen Pháidín mic Mhaoil Eachluinn mic Dubhthaigh Óig mic Dubhthaigh Mhóir do thóghháil an lechta do chlochaibh snoighte atá ós ur thobair mhóir na Sgríne, re hanam a fir phósta .i. "Kalends of January 1599. Bean Mhumhan Óg, daughter of O'Duigenan, of Paudeen son of Maol Eachluinn son of Dubhthach Óg son of Dubhthach Mór, put up the monument of dressed stone which is over the great well of Skreen¹ for the soul of her husband, the Vicar MacDonnell, and Eoghan MacDonnell was the name of that Vicar, and Mary, daughter of Tadhg Dall Ó Huiginn was born in the aforesaid year. And the blessing of God upon those souls."

Where the corruption precisely is can only be conjectured. Probably the entries for two different years have become confused, or the date given may be due to a scribal error.

From the sources discussed above, the genealogy of the Ó Huiginn given by O'Clery,² and references in the annals and English official documents, it is possible to construct a brief account of the poet and his family. The origin of the name Ó Huiginn is obscure, but it is significant that the immediate descendants of the ancestor from whom the surname is taken bear Norse forenames. Taking this together with the fact that no native name *Uigenn or *Ogann has yet been found we are justified in taking the surname to have had foreign provenance. I conjecture that it comes from uicing = Norse vikigr 'viking'. Cf. uiginnecht RC 12, 463, and Professor Marstrander's Bidrag til det Norske sprogs historie i Irland, 109. The spelling in BB, Uí Uiging (84 a 31) may also be significant. Professor Marstrander informs me that he considers the identification probable, and in reply to a query on the subject addressed to Professor Eóin MacNeill in December 1919 I received an interesting letter, part of which I print here, with his permission³:

"The O hUiginn pedigree is probably genuine up to Bard Boirne, whose floruit is about 930. His grandson Flannacán fl. c. 1000. From him Tuathal of O'Clery's genealogy is 18th, and three generations in the male line of Irish genealogies averages closely 100 years, so that Tuathal's floruit should be about 1600¹. . .

It is certain that the higher part of the pedigree is not authentic, as it would put Fiacha mac Néill (a quo Cenél Fiachach) in the 9th century instead of the 5th. Possibly the earlier Uiginn is fictitious. Note that the pedigree says Flaithbertach was "do muintir Uiginn" though "muintir Uiginn" take their surname from Uiginn 5th in descent from Flaithbertach. Thus someone may have described Fl. like this: "Fl. mc Cormaic .i. ui Uiginn", and in that way Uiginn could have crept in as the name of his grandfather. The second Uiginn "ó táit Ui Uiginn" should have flourished c. 1100, which is within the period of Ó-surnames. It is rather remarkable that his son is named Robert, no doubt after Robert of Normandy, the crusader.

The Cenél Aeda with whom Imar an tSléibe lived was of course quite distinct from Cenél Fiachach of Mide, though both names are sometimes Englished alike, Kinalea. . .

I see no difficulty in your proposed identification of Uicing, Uiging in these names with vikingr, none certainly in the absence of vikingr as a personal name. I have myself proposed to derive Brénainn from Cymric breenhin < *Bregentinos, and Conaing from the word for king in some old Low-German dialect of England, both names having nom. and gen. identical in form, therefore foreign. The nomenclature does not necessarily imply a Norse origin for the family. It would be strange to find a man of Norse descent blossoming into Irish poetry in Mide early in the 10th century. His grandfather, the first Uicing, should have arrived at Clonmacnois with Turgesius! As suggested above, I am inclined to regard this first Uicing as fictitious. In general, I feel that we must be cautious about accepting the pedigrees of the poet-historian families. They had every temptation to invent, and all the material. The wonder is that, as in this instance, they did not manage to put a better face on it.

As your quotation shows², the nobles of Fir Ceall were not all of the same sept as their rulers, muintir Mailmuaid, and it is quite possible that muintir Uicing belonged to some old local stock, which made no demand for a pedigree from Adam until Flaithbertach took to literature, or rather until his line acquired a reputation in literature.

Yours sincerely,

Eóin Mac Néill

[postscript] A surname in Ó might arise from a nickname or epithet, at all events, though I can recall no instance at the moment, the genealogies show familiarity with the notion in such septnames as Uí Méith etc., where the eponym is held to have been an epithet (Muiredach Méth etc.).

The Uiginn given as son of Fiacha is evidently, as Prof. MacNeill suggests, fictitious. Apart from the chronological difficulty, it is remarkable that this son of Fiacha is not mentioned elsewhere. The official genealogies place the Uí Uiginn amongst the Fir Ceall, a stock whose name is preserved in that of the barony of Fircall, in King's County. A branch of the family held land in that county down to the middle of the 17th century. At least one document assigns them to Fir Sceinni, a group which seems to have been originally located near Armagh¹. In the 16th century we find the name in King's County, Westmeath, Leitrim, Roscommon, Sligo, Mayo, Galway and Clare.² The pedigrees given by O'Clery were undoubtedly constructed for the Connacht branch of the family, apparently the only one which distinguished itself prominently in the bardic profession. From the 14th century down the Uí Uiginn of Connacht were celebrated as poets and instructors in the art of poetry. The bardic school of Ceall Cluaine, referred to by Tadhg Dall,³ is incidentally mentioned in a copy of the 16th cent. Irish Grammatical Tracts, and it is noteworthy that Kilclony appears several times in the 16th-17th century Fiants as the residence of individuals of the Ó Huiginn family. It is not an extravagant assumption that this school was conducted by the family. We know that Fearghal, who flourished c. 1400, kept such a school.⁴ The literary eminence of the family is frequently referred to.

² For this county I have only one reference so far: Mathghamhain Maol, son of Ruaidhri, of Balletample, prnd. Fiants of Eliz. 5848.

Fearghal's son Brian, who died 1476, is designated ceud scoile Erenn ocus Alban, 'head of the bardic order¹ of Ireland and Scotland' in the Annals of Loch Cé. In the same annals Fearghal's brother, Tadhg Óg, who died 1448, is described as head of the bardic order of Ireland, and Eóghan, son of Brian, who died 1510, is described there as oide fer nGaoidel re dán 'teacher in poetry of the men of Ireland' i. e. 'supreme teacher of poetry amongst Irishmen.' The same term is applied to Tomás Ó Huiginn, who died in 1536. The bardic families who come nearest to the Ó Huiginns in fame are the O'Dalys and Magraths; Gofraidh Fionn Ó Dálaigh,² Eóghan Mac Raith (an tÓrthóir)³ and Tadhg Óg Ó Huiginn⁴ are the three poets most frequently referred to as models by the profession during the 15th and 16th centuries. Their verses are copiously cited in the grammatical tracts, as well as their opinions on points of style.

In O'Clery's table the Ó Huiginn family divides into two branches after Tadhg, son of Giolla Coluim. From Fearghal Ruadh there are only three generations, reaching possibly to c. 1570; from Tadhg Óg there are 8, bringing us very little further, as the death of Giolla Coluim, one of the four of the last generation, is recorded ALC 1587. O'Clery did not, unfortunately, bring the record down to his own date. This Giolla Coluim's brother, Mathghamhain, son of Maol Muire, is evidently identical with the Matheus O Higyn of Dougharane, Leyney, Co. Sligo, who died in 1585. He is not mentioned in any of the published annals, but a few of his poems, encomiastic and religious, are extant. He was the father of Tadhg Dall, and of Maol Muire, Catholic archbishop of Tuam. The latter, who appears to have been employed in some important political mission in 1589,⁵ died at Antwerp about 1590.

Tadhg Dall, according to the age assigned to him in the inquisition on his father's lands, was born about 1550, eight years before Elizabeth came to the throne of England. He was therefore 17 years of age when Shane O'Neill, to whom one of the earliest of his extant poems is addressed, was slain. We have no direct proof that Tadhg was blind, as his sobriquet would seem to imply. That he acted as a juror seems evidence to the contrary. Possibly we are to understand that he was blind in one eye, or perhaps myopic. In the lines attributed to Niall Mhac an Bhaird (infra p. 277) he is called Tadhg tuadhall Ó Huiginn. This might stand for tuah/lall 'blind in the left eye(?)'. One would expect some evidence from his works, but they supply none. The pieces in which descriptive passages occur convey no suggestion of the composer's inability to see, but then the stereotyped character of such descriptions renders them quite unreliable as evidence on this point. The only poem in which one can discern a possible hint at such a personal disability is the curious appeal to William Burke (22). The suggestion in the penultimate stanza that the chief could be in the vicinity without the knowledge of the poet might perhaps be looked upon as evidence of blindness; on the other hand such pieces as 8 and 11 might be cited as decisive evidence on the other side, did not the curiously impersonal character of the court poems in general make us cautious in accepting their testimony in such a matter. It is possible that dall in this instance has the meaning of 'dull-witted,' and was applied to the poet as a compliment 'per antiphrasin'.¹

His birthplace was most probably in Leyney, and according to his own statement in 3 he was fostered in Tirconell. His first poetic composition, on the testimony of the well-known Meath scribe, Seón Mac Solaidh, was the following satirical quatrain:²

*Fear dána an macámhsa thiar, adearar iasg ré hiasg beag;
goirthear nead do nead an eóin, nead an finnin feóir is nead.*

'This youth behind is a poet; a little fish is called a fish; the nest of the bird is a nest, that of the titmouse(?)¹ has no other designation.'

Apparently the victim of this thrust had a limited vocabulary; most bardic poets have too many words for the same thing.

Of the early life and education of Tadhg Dall we have no special information. He must have passed through the usual course of professional training², but in what part of Connacht or Tirconnell³ he studied his profession, and under what teachers, we are uninformed. From a few vague references in his own poems we learn that he was, as already stated, fostered in Tirconell; that in 1572, or thereabouts, he quarrelled with Hugh O'Donnell on account of the latter's refusal to safeguard the poet's friends and kinsfolk during one of his punitive expeditions into north Connacht.⁴ In the oral traditions current in Donegal Tadhg Dall is said to have been the poet of O'Connor Sligo.⁵ The contemporary holder of that title was Donnell, son of Tadhg. According to the poet's own statement in 14, Cathal, Donnell's brother, was one of his earliest patrons. The poems he addressed to this chieftain are, however, no longer extant. Nor have I found any addressed by him to Donnell himself; but from the curious appeal to Mór, U was copied by O'Curry from Bk., where it appears in a collection of stanzas of a similar character (See Ériu 8, 81 note). Donnell's wife, (15), we learn that the chieftain took offence at a poem which Tadhg had addressed to O'Donnell (Hugh son of Manus), and that deprived of his powerful patronage, the poet had lived in great misery for over a year.¹ The patron with whom he had most intimacy was an unidentifiable William Burke. With this chief his relation was not only that of a follower, they were united by the bond of art. Each taught the other what he himself had learned; music, history and poetry; all the delights afforded by such books as they had, brought these two together, and united them in an apparently indissoluble friendship. However, in after years it befell the chief, whether by accident or design is unknown, to spoil the poet of his cattle on a reaving expedition. Tadhg expresses his feelings in 23, a piece which was obviously composed more in sorrow than in anger. The imperious note of his remonstrance with O'Donnell (3) is completely lacking here.

The principal powers of Lower Connacht in Tadhg Dall's day were O'Connor Sligo in Sligo, MacWilliam Burke in Mayo, MacDermott in Roscommon, O'Rorke in Leitrim. O'Donnell of Donegal unceasingly asserted his claim to overlordship of Sligo, a claim which O'Connor Sligo resisted whenever possible.²

The neighboring and subordinate chiefs associated themselves now with one side, now with the other, according to the personal policy of the moment. Eventually Donnell O'Connor submitted himself in November 1567 to Queen Elizabeth, at her palace at Hampton Court, "and there in his Irish tongue, ² O'Grady thus refers to the difficulty of collecting O'Donnell's rent from his unwilling tributary: "O'Connor-Sligo was O'Donnell's gentleman, and continually it needed hundreds of swords and axes (many of whom never saw Tirconall again) to persuade him to his duty." Silva Gad. II xvii. Cf. "And whereas he (viz O'Donnell) and his Auncestors, have had a rent of iii C Markes Yerely out of Ochonnor Sligaghs Countrie, fabulouslye chalenged to have bene paied, ever since St. Patrick's Dayes, but probably averred on both sides, it hath bene taken for these fower or fyve Discents by the Odonnelles (but never without Vyolence alleaged Ochonnor) . . . Ochonnor compounded in Englande to geve an hundered Markes Yerelye, to be dischargd of Odonnell, and so hath his Countrey graunted hym, under the Great Seale of England; but, if I can clenlye dischargd hym from Odonnell, he shall pay better." Sidney's Correspondence, ed. 1746, p. 116.

by an interpreter, declared to her Majesty that the chief cause of his coming¹ was to see and speak to the illustrious and powerful Princess, whom he recognized to be his sovereign Lady, acknowledging that both he and his ancestors had long lived in an uncivil, rude and barbarous fashion, destitute of the true knowledge of God, and ignorant of their duty to the Imperial Crown of England." At the same time he surrendered to the Queen all his lands and goods, together with the captainship of his country, "imploring the Queen's pardon and grace, and that he may be henceforth reputed as an Englishmen and," most important of all, "praying her to grant him his said country and lands, to be held of her Majesty, and that he may be for ever exempted from subjugation, and servitude, and from all other burdens, to be exacted by O'Donnell, or any other."² The Annals of Loch Cé record in 1568 the return of O'Conor Sligo from England, bearing a patent on his land from the Queen. He did not, however, observe the stipulations very carefully, and neglected certain legal formalities. He found moreover that it needed something more than a Crown patent to rid himself of O'Donnell, and expel the Tirconell forces from the border castles. In June 1569 he wrote to Cecil that the neighboring Irish were oppressing his country "with many hurts". In June 1576 Sidney writes that he intends to send commissioners to examine O'Donnell's claims against O'Conor and hopes to come to an arrangement whereby "the Quenes Maiestie shall be entituled to the Rent and Service from them both." He mentions that O'Conor³ desired me to constitute a Sheriff in his Countrie wishinge rather a Forriner than any of the Soyles Brede,³ which I graunted, and sent one with Commission." The sheriff appointed was Risdeard mhac Teabóid Bhuidhe Mhég Seóinín. In the following year O'Conor, aided by the President of Connacht (Nicholas Malbie), MacDermott, MacWilliam Burke (John son of Oliver, see 17), and the rest of the nobles of Connacht, with the exception of O'Rorke, captured Bundrowes castle from O'Donnell's garrison. O'Donnell retaliated by invading Lower Connacht, plundering Leyney, Tirerrill and Carbury, and incidentally killing the Sheriff of Sligo. The Subsheriff, Robert Savage, was slain the same year, by MacDonogh of Corann. Perhaps O'Connor was not really unpatriotic in preferring that none of 'the Soyle's Brede' should engage in this unhealthy service. In May 1580 Malbie reports that O'Connor Sligo excuses himself from attending him at Roscommon "because he stood in doubt of O'Donnell's invasion, whereby he is driven to fly his cattle into the plains of Connaught. The matter depending between O'Donnell and O'Connor Slygo is the only thing that now is to disquiet this Province," Carew 1580 p. 253. In 1581 Malbie, on what pretext it does not appear, sent an army of Scots into Lower Connacht. They were opposed by O'Connor Sligo, with his brother Cathal Óg (14) and several other noblemen with their followers, including Mael Mora Mac Sweeny (25). Both Cathal and Mael Mora were slain by the Scots in the conflict which ensued; two sore losses to Tadhg Dall. The new Sheriff of Sligo was Brian, son of Tadhg O'Rorke, nephew of the famous Brian na Murrtha (16). He went with a force of Irish and English to Brefney and took a prey, some of his Irish followers being slain in an attempt to rescue the spoil.¹ In the same year Malbie sent a large force of Scots and English into Lower

It does not appear that Col. Wood-Martin had any other authority for his account of this incident than ALC. The sheriff O'Rorke made another expedition into Brefney the following year, on which occasion "his official duties" included the kidnapping of the wives of the Mac Tighernans. Cf. Connacht and they were quartered over the county Sligo. O'Connor Sligo entered into a conspiracy with the English officers, and being joined also by the other chiefs of the district, they contrived the massacre of over a hundred of the Scots. O'Connor's motive was naturally to revenge the slaying of his brother Cathal. The others may have considered it no harm to rid the neighborhood of some of these redoubtable mercenaries, whose presence was not always an unmixed benefit even to their employers.

The occupation of Lower Connacht by Scottish and English troops is referred to in 41 and 42; two very interesting pieces, which have unfortunately come down to us only in a fragmentary state.

In 1585 the nominal subjection of Connacht to English law was completed by the 'Composition' between the Deputy, Sir John Perrott, and the Irish lords, whereby the latter formally surrendered their lands to the Crown of England, receiving back sufficient to maintain their own state, to be held by them at a certain rent, renounced all claims on their vassals, who were henceforth to hold direct from the Crown, or by military service, and consented to the abolition of the native titles. Amongst the signatories to this agreement were three of Tadhg Dall's patrons, MacWilliam Burke (Richard son of Oliver, see 20; brother of John of 17), O'Rorke (Brian na Murrtha, 16; brother of O'Connor Sligo's wife, see 15) and O'Hara (Cormac, see 20-32) chief of Leyney, Tadhg's own district. The land held by the Ó Huiginn family in Sligo, was probably a grant from O'Connor, as for generations they had functioned as poets to that family. The vassals referred to in the Composition were the chiefs of the different districts tributary to such overlords as O'Connor Sligo in Sligo, MacWilliam Burke in Mayo, etc. The condition of 'the meaner sort of freeholders', amongst whom Tadhg Dall would perhaps have been reckoned by the English officials, does not appear to have been materially altered either in intention or in fact by the new arrangement. In 30 the poet refers to the enforcement of new regulations by the English in Ireland; the inhabitants of each territory are to be summoned; the name of each one is to be recorded on a parchment roll, and every man is to acknowledge as his lord some chief who will take responsibility for him. Those without a chief to protect them are to be put to death summarily. The date of this poem is 1584 or 1585. Tadhg selects Cormac as his guarantor, ostensibly for that nobleman's goodness and generosity, and acceptability to the authorities on both sides, but it is not clear that anyone but the chief of Leyney, where his lands were situated, could have been of any help to him. As to his tenure under the Composition the inquisitions give it as one of military service. In that case he held direct from O'Connor Sligo, as did the ordinary freeholders of the county. The whole question of land tenure in Ireland in the 16th century awaits investigation by a trained lawyer with a sound knowledge of Irish.

In the elegy on Cathal O'Connor (14) Tadhg refers to patrons in Mayo, secured through Cathal's influence. Of those mentioned only the MacWilliam Burkes are represented in his extant poems. John son of Oliver Burke (17) became MacWilliam in 1571, and was appointed Seneschal of Connacht by the English Government in 1575. He was bilingual in the style of the period, speaking Latin and Irish, but "wanting the English tongue." Sidney's description of him is supported by the FM, who speak of him as a man of peace. He died in 1580. His successor as MacWilliam, Richard an Iarainn, died in 1582 and was succeeded by John's brother Richard, who is celebrated in 20. This new MacWilliam had been in active opposition to the English officials and his predecessor. He submitted on gaining the captainship, but died in 1585. The identity of the other members of the clan addressed by Tadhg Dall is difficult, in some cases impossible, to establish.

The forty odd poems ascribed to Tadhg Dall in extant MSS. can only bear a very small proportion to the amount of his actual production. They owe their preservation to the circumstance that the subjects were members of families who gave freely to men of letters, and employed scribes to write up their poem-books. Very few of the poems can be dated even approximately. Elegies can be dated when we have a separate record of the subject's death; thus 14 we can place in 1581, the year in which Cathal O'Connor was slain. Some are apparently inaugural addresses, and may be assigned to the years in which the chiefs whom they compliment were inaugurated. Thus 7, 9, 17, 20, may be assigned to the years 1567, 1566, 1571, 1582, respectively.

The poet's death took place in 1591. According to a tradition which has been built upon rather too heavily, he was murdered by some members of the O'Hara clan, incensed by his satire describing them as six thieving vagrants, ragged and poverty-stricken, who in return for his hospitality, had robbed him of his milk (44). For this murder the evidence, as I have shown above, is very slender, and does not justify the circumstantial accounts given by some modern writers. Yet the tradition cannot be rejected offhand. Further evidence may yet be forthcoming, and for the present it is sufficient to record what is available.

Judging by his extant compositions, and the amount of land held by him at his death, Tadhg Dall's career was a fairly prosperous one on the whole. We could, of course, speak more definitely about it if it were possible to date each poem even to the year, but only in a few cases can this be done, and it is useless to build up elaborate theories on guesswork. If 16 refers, and we may safely assume so, to O'Rorke's revolt against Bingham in 1589, it is then, apart from the satire on the six robbers, the latest piece to which an approximate date can be assigned.

In 1584 Tadhg was residing with his father, Mathghamhain, at Dougharane¹ between Tubbercurry and Coolany, in the par. of Achonry, Leyney bar., Co. Sligo. I have not been able to discover the Irish form of Dougharane; the various spellings Dughorne, Doughorne, Doogharne, Dwacharny, etc. may represent a compound beginning with Dubh-, such as Dubhcharn; or Dúthaigh followed by a proper name. Subsequently Tadhg's home was at Cowlerecoyle (now Coolreцуill), in the parish of Kilmactigue. The Irish form of this name is also wanting, but the spellings point to Cúl re coill 'Back to the wood,' i. e. a place with a wood sheltering it behind. The lands held by Mathghamhain Ó Huiginn at his death in 1585 were the villa or hamlet (Ir. baile) of Dougharane and the two quarters called Leghballymoylagh, held in capite from the Queen, according to the inquisition cited above. Tadhg Dall, his heir, held at his death in 1591 the two quarters, or leathbhaile of Coolreцуill, styled Leighballycowlerecoyl, the two quarters styled Leghballykyldallyhe, and five other quarters, styled respectively Carrowne-casshell, Carrownecromtampla, Carrowclownegounaghe, now Cloongounagh, Carrowclownbarrie, now Cloonbarry, Carrowknyekillynbane. These lands were stated to have been held at the fortieth part of a knight's fee.

The property passed to his son, Tadhg Óg Ó Huiginn, who is described in a pardon of 1603¹ as: 'Teige oge Mc Teige Daile O'Higgin of Dwacharny (= Dougharane), rymer.'² In the same pardon are included: Will. O Higgin, Twoholl O Higgin, Cormuck O Higgin, and Gillenewf (= Giolla na Naomh) O Higgin, all 'rymers,' of Dwacharny. It is not stated in what relation they stood to Tadhg Óg. In a grant to Tadhg Óg, Pat.Roll, Jac. I, 14 lviii, Cowlerecoyle, Carrowne-casshell, Cloongounagh, Leghballykyldallyhe, together with Dougharane (spelt Doogharne) and Leghballymoylagh were included with some other parcels of land. In 1641 most of these lands were still held by the Ó Huiginn family in the person of Paul Higgins, possibly a son of Tadhg Óg. In 1666 Dougharane was assigned to William Hunter, Cowlerecoyle to Lewis Winkfeild, Carrowclownbarrie to Sir Arthur Gore. Cloongounagh was assigned to Sir Theophilus Jones in 1668.

It would be of interest if one could identify the ex-priest, Paul Higgins, employed by Narcissus Marsh as lecturer in Irish in T.C.D. in 1688, with the occupier of Tadhg Dall's land in 1641.

Before discussing the character of Tadhg Dall's work I give a brief account of the literary and social status of the Irish bardic poet.

THE BARDIC POETS AND THEIR WORK

Accepting the extant remains as an index we find that for nearly two hundred years preceding Kinsale the considerable body of contemporary Irish literature, apart from legal and scientific tracts, annals, genealogical tracts, homiletic matter and religious verse, is the court poetry. This, while historically and linguistically of great value, rarely shows any imaginative quality, being in most cases strictly conventional both in style and aim. Such a falling away from the promise of the early Middle Irish lyric and the hopeful beginnings of Early Modern prose may be partly accounted for by the enormous destruction of manuscripts. We actually possess evidence that prose compositions of great interest have been destroyed. Yet the fact that a disproportionately large part of what has been preserved of the contemporary secular literature consists of documents tending solely to family aggrandizement points indisputably to perverted taste as a notable factor in producing this state of affairs. Some may plead the ever present 'state of the country,' but this does not explain all. Down to the end of the 16th century, to go no further, there was always peace somewhere. The rule in such territories as Glenmalure and Donegal, for instance, was probably despotic, but as long as the exterior enemy could be excluded it undoubtedly insured a fairly even tenor of life for men of letters¹ according to the standard of the time in Ireland. Education was not of course so easily attainable as in the present day, but that disability was not peculiar to Ireland. There was a tendency to restrict certain professions to certain families,² but as we see fresh names

¹ This stanza from a 15th cent. elegy illustrates the immunity of the lettered classes of that period from ordinary burdens:

Do-chonnarc Magh Luirg go léir— don tsaoghal is eadh eisín—fá dhó gan éanbhó ón fíor, acht bó éarlóimh nó fíliodh.

'Twice have I seen the Plains of Boyle—such is the world—left by him without a single cow, save that of a cleric or a poet.' RIA 3 C 13, 700.

² According to the Clanricarde Memoirs the bardic seminaries were "open only to such as were descended of Poets and reputed within their Tribes," and this restriction of certain callings each to a single kindred in each district "as to poetry, and most of the rest, was still preserved in appearing in the poetical profession again and again, there was evidently some means by which those not immediately of the blood could at least learn to make verse.

When James inherited the three crowns there were bardic schools all over the country, turning out 'rimers' much as a modern university turns out bachelors of arts. The graduates of these schools had an accurate knowledge of their native language, of the official history of Ireland and of her literature. They were men of talent and some intellectual influence, and had they possessed a larger conception of their mission Ireland might have found herself, in her national literature, long before 1600. But the light was obscured by an unhappy formalism. The candidate for poetry, as it was officially understood, had to be connected with a bardic family, and go through a tedious process of training. The training might be a good mental discipline, but the qualified poet was further constrained to work strictly in accordance with century-old rules of form. The process of literary composition was surrounded with a pompous mystery. The general use in verse of the current pronunciation, of freer measures, was treated by the schoolmen as a clownish proceeding, only worthy of illiterates. In brief—the attitude of the literati was not such as to encourage intellectual progress, and was in all probability an important contributory cause of the decay of Irish literature.

Rules of form need not prevent the expression of original thought, but to maintain himself in his professional status the poet had to follow the example of his colleagues and compose for the gratification of the only public which could support him. Hence it follows that the matter of bardic poetry is mostly encomium and elegy, and for centuries it is run in moulds conformable to the requirements of these. Towards the end of the 16th century we find Eóghan Ruadh Mhac an Bhaire¹ attempting to express a more intellectual outlook in verses which reflect a faint gleam of the humanizing influence which was beginning—too late—to rise over the schools. Another poet of the same period whose work shows signs of intellectual advance is Eochaidh Ó Heódhusa,¹ one of the first prominent writers to use freer forms. He was a master of the strict metres, and his originality is not completely obscured even by the conventional eulogy which formed the main ware of the bardic poet.

These eulogies were fashionable portraits in verse,² and they brought quick profits. They added lustre to the nobleman's fame, as the lampoons for which the poets were so dreaded dimmed and sullied it. A large duanaire, that is, a collection of encomiums, was evidence of the possessor's liberality, and liberality and good repute were synonymous in bardic society. We have a number of references in the poems themselves showing that poetry was highly valued as an instrument for maintaining family reputations. The following lines are from a poem composed c. 1500, protesting against an attempt to suppress bardic poetry:

Dá mbáidhtí an dán, a dhaoine, gan seanchas gan seanlaoidhe—go bráth acht athair gach fir rachaidh cách gan a chluinsin.

Dá mbáidhtí seanchas chlann gCuinn, agus bhar nduana, a Dhomhnuill, clann bhar gconmhaor 's bhar gclann saor ann do budh comhdhaor comhsaor.

Fir Éireann—más é a rothal ionnarba na healathan, gach Gaoidheal budh gann a bhreath, gach saoirféar ann budh ailheach.

"Should poetry be suppressed, men; if there is to be no historic lore, no ancient lays—save the name of each man's father—none will be heard of. . . . Should the historic lore of the children of Conn, and thy poems, Donal, be suppressed—then would the children of your dogkeepers be equally noble or equally servile with the children of your nobility. If it is the resolve of the men of Ireland to banish poetic art—poor will be the power of every Gael; then will every nobleman be a churl.”¹

The verse which illustrated family greatness was carefully preserved; piety insured the survival of a great mass of religious poetry; verse which was merely emotional or personal was left to chance, and that such compositions² have come down to us even in a small quantity is due to the rare taste of a few individuals. And so in the extant manuscripts encomium occupies a disproportionately large place.

We have remarked the shortcomings of the court poets, we may now take up the pleasanter task of recording something of what lies to their credit. For literary expression they had a certain taste, and the sound linguistic tradition which they built up has its justification in the style of the best prose

¹ See the whole of this poem in the Irish Monthly, Dec. 1919 p. 679. The date given by the editor to the piece is too late; lines are cited from it in the early 16th century grammatical tracts. Similar sentiments are expressed by TD's contemporary, Edmund Spenser:

But such as neither of themselves can sing,	How manie great ones may remem- bred be,
Nor yet are sung of others for reward, Die in obscure oblivion, as the thing Which never was, ne ever with regard Their names shall of the later age be heard,	Which in their daies most famouslie did florish; Of whome no word we heare, nor signe now see, But as things wipt out with a sponge to perishe,
But shall in rustic darknes ever lie, Unless they mentioned be with in- fame.	Because they living cared not to cherishe,
What booteth it to have been rich alive?	No gentle wits, through pride or covetize,
What to be great? What to be gracious?	Which might their names for ever memorize.
When after death no token doth survive
Of former being in this mortal hous,

Another ingenious defence of the profession is attributed to Colum Cille: bidh a fíis acat nach beith an náire no an feile is na dainib muna beith daine aca da tiubraidis ní d'ecla a cainte no a n-ærtha mar ataid na filedha. Manus O'Donnell's Beatha C.C. § 332.

writers of the 17th and 18th centuries, when the schools were disestablished and the scholars and teachers dispersed, in many cases exiled beyond the sea. We are justified in saying moreover, that those writers of our own times in whose work the genius of the Irish language is most faithfully obeyed, and taste and accuracy of expression most carefully regarded, owe something of their linguistic attainment to the careful industry of the bardic schools. The schools did not make the noblest use of the language, but they certainly watched over it carefully and jealously. They had ears and eyes for its characteristics and proprieties. They knew what was to be avoided, and distinguished carefully dialectical innovations which were permissible and those which were not. They raised no objections to borrowed words, but they stood firmly against the misuse of native ones. If they have not left us great epics, perhaps from constitutional inability to produce them, we at least owe them our gratitude for that which they were competent to produce, for the comprehensive and scrupulous records of their language preserved and redacted in the schools during several centuries. While encomium was their principal product, they have also left us a good deal of verse, which if not always poetical in the modern sense, shows observation, thought, humor and wit of a very excellent kind. Sometimes, moreover, their encomiums include shrewd and healthy political advice deftly expressed in terms of formal panegyric. Their work is never slovenly, and vulgarity or indecency of expression is conspicuously absent. As to their political influence see below p. XLIV.

A brief account of the education and methods of the poets will throw more light on their work. The views on Irish 'rimers' and their productions expressed by English statesmen, poets and pamphleteers of the period have been frequently printed and cited¹ and I do not propose to make any further reference to them here. The most reliable, as well as the most comprehensive account of the Irish bardic poet, his training and his work, is the paper entitled Bardic Poetry, published by Professor Osborn Bergin in the Journal of the Ivernian Society 1913, p. 153 ff.¹ In this paper are cited the description of a bardic school given in the Clanricarde Memoirs, and Martin's description of the Gaelic bards of the Hebrides at the end of the 17th century, together with an amount of valuable illustrative material drawn from the works of the poets themselves. I give here merely a short outline of the information detailed by Professor Bergin, with a few hitherto unprinted extracts from Irish writers.

During the period 1250-1650² the regulations governing the bardic order do not vary perceptibly. Language, metre, methods of composition and declamation are similar for at least four centuries. Muireadhach Albanach is quite as intelligible—or unintelligible, as the case may be—to us as Fear Feasa Ó'n Cháinte. The students of poetry were instructed in the language, the pronunciation of the classical dialect, the use of the various metres, the proprieties of expression for the different styles. The course also included instruction in the official history, and memorizing the tales in the saga-cycles. Whether an acquaintance with the various adaptations of foreign romance and pseudo-history was required of the candidate is not known, but the work of the poets shows that they were familiar with these.

The training took place in residential schools during the winter months from the beginning of November until the end of March. When the cuckoo's voice was heard the schools broke up, and the students returned to their homes. This part of the account in the Clanricarde Memoirs is supported by the following stanzas from Tadhg Óg Ó Huiginn's elegy on his brother,¹ who conducted a bardic school in Connacht in the earlier part of the 15th century:

² 1650 is the usual, and roughly accurate terminus as regards Ireland. Although the strict metres were fitfully practised for many years later, the schools and their system never revived. Amongst the latest specimens of genuine Irish dán díreach extant are the poems addressed by Maol Muire son of Eóghan Ó Huiginn to Sir Lucas Dillon of Costello-Gallen, the 2nd Viscount, who died in 1655. For an interesting example of strict verse as composed in Ireland c. 1700 see ZfcP 2, 362. Of course a few poets of our own day practise the style with artistic success, but the smallness of their number, together with the fact that their work is caviare to all but two or three, prevents any anticipation of a serious revival. In Scotland and the Isles the bardic order preserved its integrity for long after the break up of the Irish schools, and strict dán díreach was produced down to the early years of the 18th century; see Bergin l. c., p. 159, and Cameron's Reliquiae Celticae.

Ionadh coinne ar chionn Sámhna do bhíodh 'gun aos ealadhna; aoinfear amháin dá maradh—nior sgaoileadh dáibh dealaghadh.

A lucht do bhí 'na bhaile, lér mhian ceard is comhnaidhe, do bhí adhbhar fár fuath libh labhradh na gcúach do chluinsin.

*Do-chuaidh ar sgaoileadh don sgoil gach fear dána 'na dhúthoigh;
ní tiaghair a toigh athar
ó sóin d'iarraidh ealadhan.*

“When November was approaching there would be a place of meeting for the followers of poetry—did one man (i. e. the teacher, whose death has caused the breaking up of the school) survive their separation would not be a parting. O ye who were in his house and sought art and residence, well might it be hateful to you to to hear the utterance of the cuckoo. When the school was dispersed each poet departed to his homeland; from his father's house no man comes any more to seek art.”

Some of the more celebrated bardic families conducted schools for several generations.

The process of composition was carried out in small darkened apartments, while the poet reclined on a couch. Professor Bergin² cites some passages illustrating this custom, and propounds an interesting theory regarding its origin and significance. It seems to be referred to in the opening line of a poem in the Dindsenchus: Cid dorcha dam im lepaid, "Though I am in darkness on my couch."¹

The completed poem was memorized by the reacaire, or bard, whose function it was to recite, or rather chant it,² with some kind of harp accompaniment, to the individual addressed. It was not necessary for the poet to be present at the performance, though he naturally would be if the chief addressed were his host at the time. The following passage from a croántacht addressed to one of the Burkes gives a vivid picture of post-prandial relaxation in the hall of an Irish nobleman of the 16th century: . . . iar suidhe ar sleasuibh réidhe a rioghbhruighean ag ól a bhfleadh bhfioruasal bhfineamhna agus a ndeochand ngarbh ngabháltach; ar bhfás ruitheadh agus ruamandachta ina rioghgnúisibh ag éisdeacht re dréachtuibh agus re duanlaoidhibh a sean agus a sinnsear 'ga soluisreic i mbéaluibh reacaireadh agus rioghbhard . . . ". . . when seated on the smooth benches of their royal mansions, quaffing their noble banquets of wine, and their harsh, heady draughts; their royal countenances flushed and glowing, as they hearken to verses and poetic lays on their ancestors and forbears, eloquently uttered by declaimers and distinguished bards . . ."³

Poems of complaint or expostulation, begging letters; addresses to a chief whom the poet hoped to gain as a patron, were sometimes at least, sent by messenger. In a Middle Irish story we read that Seanchán Torpéist sent a poem to the king of Ireland by his attendant, who chanted it to the king, and returned to the poet with the reward bestowed.⁴

The ordinary panegyric was usually, no doubt, occasioned by the inauguration of a new chief, or a successful foray followed by a generous entertainment. In 1549 Mac Dermot of Moylurg made a foray on which he captured 1260 cows, all of which he distributed on St. Stephen's Day to a gathering of poets and scholars whom he entertained on that date (ALC ad ann.). In 1561 the same Mac Dermot made an extensive raid in Roscommon, and his camp, according to ALC, was not excelled by any camp in Ireland in the amount it contained of steeds, armature, meat, wine, minstrels, poets, galloglasses, yeomen and Scots (i. e. Scottish mercenaries).

It was common for poets to keep guesthouses (lighe aoigheadh coitchinne), where apparently free hospitality was dispensed. See, e. g., ALC ii 334, 378. Undoubtedly these were used as meeting-places for men of letters, where news and literary opinions were put into circulation. See also ZfcP 8, 109.

Amongst his own countrymen the poet had in virtue of his hereditary profession a superior social status. In English official documents we frequently find him described as generosus, the term 'rimer' being rather rare on the whole. In a document of 1563 "rymers, bards and diceplayers" (Ir. cearrbhaigh) are classed together as "Idlemen", i. e. landless gentlemen. See Hardiman's Statute of Kilkenny pp. 59, 62-3.

It is commonly assumed that the Irish poet was permanently and exclusively attached to a single chief or family; the evidence of historical documents and of the poems themselves points to a different order. The bardic profession was built up on the ruins of — or perhaps we might say was a protective metamorphosis of — the ancient druidic order, and was always a craft with its own dues, privileges and prerogatives, decided by itself. Its closest analogy in this country in modern times is the bar. If we read the collected poems of any one of the court poets we shall find chiefs of different families and various political tendencies addressed in the same terms of familiarity and regard. Exclusive attachment to a single chief or family is not the custom.¹

¹ Cf. Thurneysen, Die Irische Helden- u. Königsage i. p. 68. The fact that a poet is sometimes described as the ollamh of a certain chief, e. g. ollamh Í Néill, as in TD 25 11-15, ZfcP 2, 352, does not imply that the attachment was exclusive. See Clanricarde Memoirs 1722, clxvii (cited by Bergin, l. c. p. 157). O'Grady's comparison (Cat. 436 n.) of the court poet to a regimental band which is permitted on occasion to perform at non-regimental functions is not quite suitable. A better simile is provided by such an official as the surgeon to the king, whose appointment does

The poet had, of course, as a member of the community, certain obligations towards the chief of his district, whose favor was a necessity of life to him. To him he would naturally look for land, pasture for his cattle, defence in times of danger, as well as support and patronage in his profession. We have an interesting illustration of this in a piece addressed to Brian O'Connor, lord of Lower Connacht († 1440) by Maol Seachluinn na nUirsgéal. The chief had bestowed land on the poet, rent free, as a reward for poems addressed to him; subsequently he deprived him of the land in a fit of displeasure, thus rendering him a homeless exile:

Do thoradh mo thri laoidheadh fa cheann feach is i'iolmhaoineadh — gidh bé adearam red ghruaidh ngil—fuair mé i'fearann i n-aisgidh.

*Ga dâm? — acht ní dheachaidh as,
gur éirigh, a ucht solas,
fearg nua ret filidh óraibh,
a ua chinidh Chonchobhair.*

*Tig don feirg sin leath ar leath, is do chomhairlibh Chairbreach,
gur cuireadh as ar n-áit inn;
cáit i suidheabh, dá suidhinn?*

*I n-éagmais m'fearainn cairte, nách truagh mé, a mheic Raghnaillte?
is do mheic óglách uaibh ann, a ghruaidh mar óghhláth n-abhall.*

“For my three poems on thy steeds and thy abundant wealth — despite whatever I may say of thy bright cheek — I obtained thy land free of charge. But in short, the thing did not subsist until thou didst again become displeased with thy poet, thou scion of Conchobhar's race. From that wrath of thine, and from the counsel of the men of Carbury, was I banished from my place; where if I may do so, shall I settle down? Without not prevent him from attending to his majesty's subjects, when they seek his advice.

my chartered land am I not wretched, thou son of Reginalda? while thou, O cheek like fresh apple-blossom, hast settled the sons of thy fighting men in it."¹

In another poem to the same chief by the same author we have a further interesting reference to bestowal of land upon poets:

Seacht leithbhliadhna dho léigeadh, gan chánaigh gan choimhéigean, Magh Inghine an Sgáil fár sgoil, ó fínnbhile Chláir Chobhthaigh.

Dh'ionadh a n-airgheadh ná a n-each, ní coigillt ar chionn Chairbreach féar uaim i n-oirchill a gcruidh, ná cluain oirchinn dá n-eachuibh.

"For seven half-years was the Plain of the Sgáil's Daughter (in Sligo or Roscommon) left with our school, free of tribute or constraint, by the fair chieftain of Cobhthach's Plain. In return for their herds or their steeds I never grudged to the men of Carbury that I should keep hay for their cattle, or a special (?)² meadow for their horses."³

Tadhg Dall himself relates (infra p. 94) that he obtained land from Cathal O'Connor of Sligo, and that this chief's patronage was the means of bringing him to the notice of the O'Donnells, O'Neills, O'Rourkes, Burkes, Costelloes and others.

According to the writer of the Clanricarde Memoirs, a poet in addressing an individual other than his own chief was bound to add a supplementary stanza in praise of the latter. This was very likely the custom. A few of these additional compliments are found attached to the compositions of Fearghal Óg Mhac an Bhaird, Eochaidh Ó Heódhusa and others. We have one in Tadhg Dall's poems, addressed, however, to Conn O'Donnell.

The poem would be preserved by the family of the chief to whom it was addressed, and it would not be surprising if the supplementary stanza were in many cases omitted by the transcriber, which would account for the rarity of such additions in the surviving copies. In those days every noble house kept a collection of encomiums and elegies on its members. The size of a nobleman's poem-book, or duanaire was, as remarked above, an index to his generosity to men of letters, and consequently of his prowess. Thus in obituary notices we find one described as a man who had a large duanaire; another as the man who had the largest duanaire of his time. Of all these poem-books, and their number must have been very large at one time, we have now only a few incomplete examples, such as the fragments of the Maguire duanaire in Copenhagen and Dublin, the Book of O'Donnell's Daughter in Brussels, the Dillon poems in RIA A v 2 etc.¹

The political influence of the poets has perhaps been over-rated,² or at least misunderstood. The ordinances which the English authorities issued against 'rimers' from time to time, show that they credited them with power for mischief. That they gave advice at times, and could, and often did, give offence and provocation is undisputable, but that they had any real constructive power in affairs has yet to be proven. At least one Lord Deputy thought it worth his while to commission some of them to 'adorn and beautify' the virtue of the English monarch:

"I take the Lorde of Heven and Erthe to witnesse, that I never receaved Rhyme at the handes of Captayne Woodhouse, written agaynst hir Majestie, as he most falslie alleadgeth, but upon Wordes which he delyvered, took Order for the Rhymer's forthcomynge, which was done by the Advise of some of hir Majestie's Counsaill. And I have given Money to Rhymer's to sett forth hir Majesties most worthie Praises, as by Maister Treasurer's of the Warres Accomptes will appere." (Perrott's Last Will and Testament, History of Sir John Perrott p. 311.)

It would be interesting to discover what sum was expended on this business, and whether the 'Rhymer's' are named in the

'Accomptes'. Cf. the panegyric on Elizabeth, attributed in some mss. to Flann son of Eóghan Mág Craith, in Ó Bruadair's Poems iii 64. As to the alleged employment of Aonghus na nAor by Carew, the question is too big to be discussed here; but it is not obvious what advantage the English authorities could hope to win by a wholesale shaming of the Irish clans. See, however, O'Gr. 34r and 443 n. 2.

It can be seen from this brief sketch that the status of the Irish bardic poet was on the whole a dignified one. If, like Dryden, he 'must live by courts or starve,' unlike the English poet, he was able, owing to the conventions under which he lived, to please patrons of differing views without violating his conscience.

THE SUBJECT-MATTER OF TADHG DALL'S POEMS

I do not think that a better representative of Irish bardic poetry, its style, compass of subject, capabilities and limitations, could be found than Tadhg Dall Ó Huiginn. He flourished at a period when the art had reached the highest and widest development of which it was susceptible under the bardic system. His verses, in their apparent ease and simplicity, and naturalness of expression, show a mastery of metrical form and style which, though equalled by a few of the craft, has rarely been excelled. In literary method he represents a kind of Augustan period, if it is not wrenching the term too violently to apply it to any manifestation of 16th century Ireland. He shows in most of his poems a calm acceptance of the contemporary strife, as though it were the natural order. Poetry flourished on it, and for him, like most bardic poets, the profession was the thing. The apprehensions and sorrows which troubled Irish poets of a slightly later period did not affect Tadhg Dall. Shadows palpable enough to us in his own poems portended no disaster to him. We may take him as a typical figure, thoroughly adapted in mind and customs to the existing order; utterly unaware of the imminent dawn of a new world.

Perhaps the most striking characteristic of the bardic eulogy is its studied ambiguity¹, a quality which of course is natural in complimentary addresses. In Tadhg Dall's verses, and those of most bardic poets the only living individual referred to is, with rare exceptions, the chief addressed. We might expect O'Donnell to be congratulated on his triumphs over O'Neill, or vice versa, but no. In the present collection the nearest approach to any actuality of the kind is in 27, where the function of MacSweeney as commander-in-chief, or wager of war (cónsabul or cónsdabla is the usual term in the annals) to O'Donnell, and so, by implication, his subservience to the latter, are clearly indicated. Battle-rolls, lists of victories, are sometimes given, but rarely are even the names of the defeated families enumerated. This assumed ignorance, within the limits of a single poem, of feuds, or of rival claims to leadership, is interesting, and seems to have been based on a convention agreed on by the poets and acquiesced in by the chiefs themselves. As to the chiefs' real opinion of it, we have some evidence, perhaps, in 8 (see O'Grady's note, Cat. 434). To the poets it was probably more acceptable, partly as being in the interests of inter-tribal concord; mainly, no doubt, in order to preserve amicable relations between themselves and any chief upon whom, in the vicissitudes of things, they might one day come to depend. See in this connection 15. A feeling for the social amenities and ordinary good taste may also have been an influence.

Brian Ruadh Mhac Con Midhe (fl. c. 1490) refers in the following stanza to the desirability of a certain tactfulness:

Dá fiasraigheadh duine dhe uaisle cháich tar a chéile, dligheadh file freagra mhall, d'eagla an tighe 'na thiomchall.

"Should anyone ask of the poet what was the relative nobility of each person, he should answer with circumspection, for fear of those around."¹

Maol Seachluinn na nUirsgéal excuses himself from detailing the exploits of Brian O'Conor lest he should offend not only the O'Kellys and other native gentlemen, but the English of

Connacht as well.¹ The only poem I can recall in which a chief is unfavorably contrasted with one of his contemporaries is Uilliam Mhac an Bhaird's Biaidh athroinn ar Inis Fáil, where the poet compares the justice and munificence of O'Donnell (Red Hugh's father) with the brutality of Conor O'Brien, Earl of Thomond, the hanger of poets.² But there was obviously nothing to expect from the Earl, and no reason (while safely under O'Donnell's protection) for refraining from a frank opinion on his works.

The sincerity of encomium is often doubtful, and noteworthy in this connection are the following lines, in which Gofraidh Fionn Ó Dálaigh³ describes the function of the court poet with frank cynicism:

*Dá chineadh dá gcumthar dán
i gcrích Éireann na n-uarán—na Gaoidhílse ag boing re bladh, is Goill bhraoininse Breatan.*

*I ndán na nGall gealltar linn
Gaoidhíle d'ionnarba a hÉirinn, Goill do sraoineadh tar sál soir
i ndán na nGaoidheal gealltair.*

"There are two kindreds for whom poetry is composed in Ireland of the cool springs—the Gaels, known to fame, and the English of Britain's dewy isle. In poetry for the English we promise that the Gael shall be banished from Ireland, while in poetry for the Gaels we promise that the English shall be hunted across the sea."⁴

Thus although the political cynicism of such a piece as 17 is somewhat astonishing at first sight, Charles O'Connor's expression of disgust⁵ is scarcely justified, as the poet is constantly assigning the monarchy to different chiefs, usually urging each claim on strictly historical grounds. Obviously if he believed O'Neill's title to be sound he could not have been equally convinced of the claims of O'Doherty, MacDonnell, MacWilliam Burke or any of the others whom he recommends. The evident explanation of these apparent discrepancies and betrayals is that the thing was not seriously intended or regarded. When the poet hails Turlogh Luineach as ruler of the land of the Gael, he means at most lord of Tyrone; when he tells the father of the first Earl of Antrim that he has a family claim to Ireland, he means in all probability nothing more than that he had as much right to make forays there as anyone else; and similarly in the cases of the Burkes and others. It is a noteworthy fact, whatever the explanation, that in connection with the few Irishmen who seriously attempted to unite the whole country only a small number of poems have been preserved. I know of but one address to Shane O'Neill (infra 6); it is preserved only in late, inaccurate MSS. Of his elegy, published by the present writer in the Irish Nation, July 2, 1910, we have only one copy, late and corrupt. We have very few addresses to Tyrone, and those only in late MSS.; while there are a number of well-preserved encomiums on Turlogh Luineach. We have several addressed to Red Hugh and Rury O'Donnell,¹ but they are not of the same style as the ordinary panegyric. They are as a rule rather in the nature of serious reflections on current events than vague encomiastic exhortations.

An interesting class of poem is that represented by 3 and 15, where the poet demands recompense for injury, or slight, or appeals for forgiveness for his own transgressions. Such pieces throw light on the relations between the poet and his patrons.

There are few poems, apart from the elegies, of which we can say with certainty on what occasions they were composed, but those which are simply encomium probably resulted in most cases from some military success on the part of those to whom they are addressed. It was the poet's trade to flatter, and for his livelihood he depended on the rewards he received for his efforts. The victor in a recent foray would be a likely source of cattle, and therefore a suitable subject for extollation. Note the procedure described in 11: the poet visits the chief; spends a most enjoyable day among warriors, poets, musicians and ladies, and after the banquet retires to rest. Ere daybreak the chief and his household go forth equipped for the foray; on their return, laden with spoil, the poets, who have evidently displayed their talents during their stay, are all handsomely rewarded, and thereupon take their leave. Poems such as 2, 16, which urge some definite line of action, are probably not so much encitements as shrewd anticipations of coming events. The more agreeable, to modern taste, are those reflective or contemplative pieces, whether elegies or reminiscences, such as 14, 25, where the poet, if he does not rise to any lofty heights of imagination or expression, still speaks with sincere emotion, and with literary feeling, of people and places in which he had once taken pleasure. Interesting also are those short occasional pieces, in praise of a woman or of his companions, where we seem to discern the nature of the genial, sociable man of letters, with a warm affection for his fellow-creatures.

The machinery, or stock-in-trade, of historical allusion is an interesting subject of study. It has for a basis the official history, as represented in Lebar Gabála and the received genealogies, from the earliest occupations down to the death of Maol Seachluinn, who is implicitly referred to as the last high-king of Ireland (e. g. 7 § 46). In the official histories Maol Seachluinn is the last king of all Ireland, the subsequent monarchs, down to Ruaidhrí Ó Conchobhair, being referred to as 'kings with opposition'.¹ As a general rule the high-kingship is not assigned to any king whose reign intervened between Maol Seachluinn and the period of the chief addressed, while genealogical justification for the succession of the latter is usually afforded. When the exigencies of the case require it the poets are ready to admit or suggest that the Milesian claims have been superseded; as when Torna Ó Maoil Chonaire, in the poem Gá mhéd gabháil uair Éire, adds to the six occupations enumerated in Lebar Gabála a seventh, that of the Fitzgeralds; or when Tadhg Dall—to the disgust of Charles O’Conor—urges the claims of a Burke, on the grounds that Ireland has ever been the prize of valor and superior force, and that hereditary claims to her have no substance or historical justification (17). But when men of Irish blood are addressed, the claims of history and pedigree are insisted upon. Stephens, Literature of the Cymry, p. 102, says of the Welsh poet, that he ‘stood in the same relation to his chieftain as a lawyer does to his client’. The attitude of the Irish poet was certainly that of an advocate. Whatever historical fact, tradition, opinion or contemporary actuality was likely to enhance the celebrity and repute of his patron for the time being was brought forward, quite regardless that the arguments used yesterday in favor of the claims of A may be conclusively against those of B, which are urged to-day. Thus, that which we seek more than anything else in poetry—the expression of personal experience—is completely wanting in the encomiastic poems. We may in a few cases learn something of the personality of the chief; note, for instance, the remarkable account of Turlogh Luineach in 8; but to learn anything of the poet himself we must seek him in an unprofessional mood, and the work he produced then has seldom been considered worthy of preservation.

Contemporary conditions are reflected in Tadhg Dall’s poems in an interesting manner. The two dominating facts of the Ireland of his day—the ‘imbedded spearpoint’, to use Lecky’s figure, of the English occupation, and the untameable military and aristocratic spirit of the native nobility invariably color the scene. Religion is scarcely referred to, but the rebuilding of dismantled churches is mentioned (1) as a token of a just ruler. The more military aspect of government is amply reflected; especially in the numerous allusions to fettered hostages. The civiler side appears in such references as those the levying to of tribute by the maor (steward, seneschal), the collection of cocket (1 § 51); the use of feminine influences, as described in 15 §§ 44-7. In 34 (wrongly ascribed to TD; belongs to c. 1530) we have a satirical reference to a mayoral election. References to the tyranny of the foreigners are frequent; some of the poems (1, 16, 18) are ardent exhortations to make war upon them. On the other hand we occasionally find it stated, as testimony to a chief's wise rule, that Gael and Gall are refraining from mutual outrages (17 § 67). The shadow of internecine war, however, which constantly haunts the poet's verse, makes it often very melancholy reading. Forays against the English, as I have said, are often urged, and mentioned; the oft-mentioned forays in which the nationality of the victims is not particularized, were obviously directed against native clans, e. gg. 3, 4, 11. The aristocratic ideal can be gauged from the qualities lauded in the chief; he is praised as a man of war, a disdainer of peace; 'sage counsel in cumber, red hand in the foray', in short. He is also congratulated—and this virtue was, we may safely assume, the one which the poet privately valued beyond all others—for his generosity to professional men; musicians, poets and men of letters in general. The two qualities, military prowess and generosity, were obviously not independent of one another. Generosity can only be valued in action. When the nobleman's wealth had been eaten up by the multitude of followers which his lavish rewards had attracted around him,¹ there was only one honorable way of replenishing his store open to a man of birth, and it needed courage and enterprise to make a profitable foray.

In literary style bardic poetry shows as a whole no epochs or tendencies. It is a flat table-land stretching from the 13th to the 17th century. Tadhg Dall, it is safe to say, uses no figure which would have puzzled his ancestor, Tadhg Óg Ó Huiginn, and the verses of the 15th century poet are just as easy, and just as difficult to us as those of his 16th century representative. Not that native originality was wanting in either of these men, but it was not required of them. Their duty was not to invent new designs and motifs, but to dispose artistically those which had been preserved from generation to generation by the bardic profession. And this is true not only as regards ideas and metaphor, but also as regards language and metre. The language of Bardic Poetry is a literary dialect, used in accordance with the strict rules brought together in the various grammatical treatises of the 15th or 16th century; the metrical forms, while not in themselves so utterly fatal to all individuality of expression as some writers on Irish literature have supposed, are carefully defined, and are singularly elaborate and artistic. With the precision and delicacy of these stately, dignified verses, in which vulgarity of any kind is literally conspicuous by its absence, how far are we from the 'rude ballads' with which Macaulay conceives the Irish people to have been amused or incited; or the 'unashamed incoherence' which later writers regard as the true Celtic stamp. As Professor Bergin observes in his preface to the Religious Poems of Aonghus Ó Dálaigh (ed. Rev. L. McKenna S. J.) "Unfortunately the polish of the verse is lost in translation, and the singular felicity of language can be felt only in the original. A knowledge of one of the modern spoken dialects will give no idea of the rich and subtle music of Bardic Poetry. That can only be appreciated after a careful study of the pronunciation and structure of the classical language as taught in the bardic schools and described in the elaborate treatises of the sixteenth century."

As there is much in the style of these poems that will be strange and sometimes quite unintelligible to the modern reader, a brief preliminary commentary on general features will be useful, and save a good deal of repetition in the illustrative notes. Most of the poems are simply complimentary addresses to chiefs; some incitatory, as 1, 16, 18; some apparently inaugural congratulations, as 7, 9; some are expostulations, complaints, or remonstrances, as 3, 15, 22, 23; some are admonitory, as 20; some are elegies, some satirical, and there are several of a less definable nature. I shall first deal with the character of the epithets applied to the chiefs. These may, for the sake of convenience in description, be divided into six classes:

1 warlike, as:—cur, féinnidh, laoch, mtlidlh,¹ any of which may be rendered by 'champion, hero, warrior, soldier, or fightingman'

¹ In this introductory note I only propose to give a representative selection of epithets; not an exhaustive list of all that occur in the present collection.

2 of rank, as:— rí, 'king', or 'lord'; airdrí, 'highking'; barr, ceann, cothnach, flaith, tighearna, etc. all used vaguely in the sense of 'prince, chief, leader, or lord'.

3 metaphorical. In several words in the following list the metaphorical notion is almost entirely submerged, and the literal rendering is not always given in the translation. For instance géag, lit. 'branch, offshoot', corresponds very well with Engl. 'stripling, scion'; when qualified by such an adj. as bonnbhán, 'white-footed', or deircmhear, 'of lively glance', the impropriety of a literal rendering is obvious. Such words as beithir, leómhan, and perhaps onchú (see note to 4 § 42), might properly, perhaps, be placed in the list of mythical animals, as they can scarcely have been living realities to the Irish poets. When used as epithets I have generally rendered these words by 'champion', or 'hero'. (See Vocab. and Notes for discussion of individual words.) Metaphorical epithets may be subdivided into eight sections:

a) names of quadrupeds, birds, fish; as:— beithir, 'bear'; cú, 'hound'; coiléan, 'whelp', damh, 'ox, stag'; eala, géis, 'swan'; éigne, éó, maighre, 'salmon, trout'; leómhan, 'lion'; coiléan leómhain, 'lion's whelp'; seabhaic, 'hawk'. It is noteworthy here that most of the animals are evidently selected rather for their grace and beauty than for their valorous attributes; e. gg. the swan, the stag, and perhaps the salmon, if the latter be not chosen on account of its association with certain aspects of pre-christian belief in Ireland. The beauty of the salmon, however, is frequently noticed in the literature at all periods. Some of these epithets certainly seem if not directly derived from the Bible, to have at least indirectly a Scriptural origin; e. g. the lion, the lion's whelp.

b) mythical animals, as:— draig, dreagan, 'dragon'; griobh, 'gryphus, griffin'. These may be taken from some of the foreign mediaeval romances adapted into Irish; or heraldry may have had some part in introducing them.¹

c) plant-terms; these are almost inexhaustible:— abhall, 'apple-tree' (cf. Cantic. 2. 3?); bile, an ancient tree; 'bláth, sgoth, ¹ Some 16th cent. descriptions of the griffin are cited in E. Phipson's Animal Lore of Shakespeare's Time (1883) pp. 460-2.

'blossom'; cnó, 'nut'; craobh, 'bough'; craobh thóraidh 'fruitful bough'; géag, 'branch'; fleasg, 'stem'; géag (craobh), crann fineamhna, 'vine-branch', 'vine-tree'; bláth fineamhna, 'vine-blossom'; subh fineamhna, 'fruit of the vine'; crann pailme, 'palm-tree'; planda, 'plant'; súgh, 'sap'; tamhan, 'trunk'; ubhall, 'apple', etc. Here also we notice exotics; the vine was not familiar to the eye in Ireland, though its produce was in use there from an early period. It can hardly be doubted that the use of the vine and the palm in these figures is due to Scriptural influence, probably conveyed by the medium of the early religious poetry.¹

d) natural phenomena:— éasga, ré, 'moon'; grian, 'sun'; réalla, 'star'; probably sluagh, which in this usage may have originally meant 'rainbow', 'arc-en-ciel', should be included here. And here also we may range such epithets as lá soineannta, lá gréine, 'fine day', 'sunny day', and the like.

e) other epithets conveying the idea of brilliance:— coinneal, lóchrann, 'torch'; and perhaps lóg lóghmhar, 'precious stone'.

f) such epithets as the following, while not to be described as 'plant-terms', have a metaphorical significance similar to that of fleasg, géag, etc.:— cleath, 'a spear, bowshaft'; slat, 'wand'; slat bhagair, 'admonishing wand', possibly a reference to the wand placed in the hand of the newly inaugurated chieftain (see Keating's History and Hy Fiachr. 425 ff.) if it be not a reminiscence of virga furoris, Is. 105. Cf. also Jer. 48. 17.²

g) we also have a large number of miscellaneous epithets, expressing costliness, rarity wisdom, or taken from ordinary desirabilities of everyday life:— teach séad, 'treasure-house'; inneóin forais, 'anvil of firmness' (?); cloch thuinighthe, 'landmark' (?); mionn scánda, mionn buaidhe, 'saining charm', 'precious charm'; luibh iocslainte, 'healing herb'; ortha codail, 'sleeping spell';

¹ Cf. Rev. P. Bartley's paper on The Old Irish Litany, Irish Monthly June 1919. When the question comes to be thoroughly investigated it will probably be found that a good many of the epithets used even in the secular poetry are due to the influence of early Irish ecclesiastical documents.

² Prof. Thurneysen has already suggested that a wellknown motif in the early sagas may be based on Scriptural phrasing, see Ir. Held. u. Königsage pt. II, p. 98.

tuobraid lín i láibh teasa, 'brimming well in sultry days'; and so on.

h) finally, the warlike nature and qualities of the chief may be illustrated by such figures as:—tonn díleanta, 'overwhelming wave'; crithir a beól cheardcha, 'spark from the mouth of the forge'; caor cheardcha, 'a glowing mass'; mtr cruadha, 'a bar of steel'; etc.

4) figurative, or metonymical; the chief is addressed as:—'defending shield', 'guarding arm', etc. of his land; 'helper of poets', etc. In this class the frequent use of the verbal noun instead of the noun of agency—a usage also common in early Irish poetry—is noteworthy.

5) also metonymical; a single part of the body is selected for the purpose of complimenting the whole:—bas seang, glac corr, 'slender, smooth, or graceful hand'; bonn bán 'white foot'; dearc mhear, rosg mall, 'glancing eye', 'gentle eye'; cneas leabhar, taobh slim, 'slender, supple body'; gnúis ghlan, gruadh glan, 'bright face', 'bright cheek'; folt tiogh, ciabh lag, 'thick, smooth hair'; etc., etc. The bardic praise of personal beauty appears to have been regulated from an early period by a strict convention; one of the sixteen rules or requisitions of poetry which the poet was obliged to observe was duinediglain, explained in the Middle Irish metrical tracts by: diglain delba in duine amal rogab: Da bræ dubæ folt buide 7rl. 'selection of the person's form, as: two black brows, yellow hair et rel.'. See Ir. Texte iii 30.

6) epithets relating to descent; the chief is addressed as descendant of some famous ruler of Ireland, who may, or may not be actually a direct ancestor of his,¹ e. gg.:—ó Néill Naoighiallaigh, 'descendant of Niall of the Nine Hostages'; (when the epithet is simply ó Néill the context may, or may not, show whether Niall N. G., or Niall Glúndubh, from whom the O'Neills are surnamed, is meant) ó Cobhthaigh, ó Úghoine, descendant of Cobhthach Caol Breagh, or of Úghoine Mór, etc.

The above list will, it is hoped, prepare the reader who is new to bardic poetry for the quaint and often to modern taste grotesque conceits of the poets.

Many of the epithets are common enough in the obituaries in the Four Masters. There is another point with regard to them, which may be treated in a separate paragraph:

Qualifications

Each of the epithets referred to above is regularly accompanied by a qualifying word or phrase, which really, of course, forms an integral part of the epithet in each instance. Such epithets as laoch, milidh, etc. are usually followed by the genitive of a tribal or territorial name; not, as a rule, by a simple adjective, though an adjective plus a place, river or tribe name is common enough, e. g., a rí fionnardghlan Fréamhann. The metaphorical epithets, when not self-qualifying (as teach séad, caor cheardcha), may be followed by an adjective, by a place, river or tribe name, or by an adjective plus any of these. The only feature which calls for special notice here is the use of what we may call territorial epithets, that is, those in which the qualifying word is a place or river name. These are not always easy to explain. When we find a chief addressed as king of Éire, Fál, Banbha, Fódlá, Breagha, Bóinn, or any other of the numerous bardic names of Ireland it may be implied that he, on account of his ancestral or personal endowments, is peculiarly fitted for the kingship of Ireland; and it is not unnatural that an O'Donnell should be addressed as 'hero of Bearnas', a Maguire as 'salmon of the Erne'; an O'Connor as lord of (the river) Duff, or Suck; but when we find the Three Collas named of Baoi (Durse Island), and the adjective Iomgháin applied indifferently to MacCarthy of Desmond, and O'Doherty of Inishowen, it is hard to see the appositeness of the reference. A possible explanation is that the usage was originally confined to the names of ancient courts, and spread to places of less historical significance. This brings us to another distinctive, but sometimes puzzling, feature of this poetry:

Bardic names for Ireland

These also may be classified:

1) poetical (or originally so, for continual usage has resulted in a kind of petrification) or fanciful: as, fiadh fuinidh, 'sunset land, land of the west'; fiadh (or clár, cró, magh, port, tulach, etc.) na bhFionn, 'land of the Fair Ones'; this also appears in the romances, and in popular poetry of a later period. e. g. "Gaibhnidhe Oileáin na bhFionn" Caoine Airt Uí Laoghaire.¹ The origin of it is uncertain. If Clár na dTrí bhFionn (18. 31) be a variation of it, we might trace it to na Trí Fionn Eamhna, ancestors of Conn the Hundredfighter (see Ériu 3, 150, and Keating) and place it in class 3 below.

2) mythological names, such as Banbha, Fódla, which may be used independently or after such words as clár, críoch, fiadh, fonn, inis, magh, etc. Fáil, as in Inis Fáil, I have not found in the nom., but as it appears not only after clár, etc. but also after rí, flath, fir, etc. we may conclude that it was felt to be of the same order as Éire, Banbha, Fódla.² It is noteworthy that this name survives in oral folklore, unrecognized, see Dialect of Donegal, 203, where fir faghail, which the narrator could not explain, appears as an alternative to fir an domhain. For a discussion of the meaning of Fál see an article by Mr. E. J. Gwynn in the Journal of the Ivernian Soc. 1910, p. 152 ff.

3) names referring to bygone kings. These are formed a) by placing any noun of location, e. gg. adhbha, achadh, cathair, clár, críoch, fiadh, fonn, gort, iath, inis, lios, magh, port, ráth, teach, before the genitive of the name of any high-king or princess from the earliest occupations down to Brian; or b) by placing bean, céile, 'spouse', before the name of any one of these kings.

This usage is discussed from the professional point of view in the Contention of the Bards:

Is tearc má do sloinneadh riamh an tírse ina bhfúneann grian mar sloinntear mír an mhíodhóil ó ríoghraidh síl Éireamhóin.

² Cf. perhaps Corc, instead of clár Cuirc, for Munster, Contribb., Add.

Goirthear Teach Tuathail d'Éirinn, Cró Chuinn is Fonn fonnFéilim, Iath Iúghoine is Achadh Airt, Críoch Cobhthaigh is Cldair Chormaic.

Thus the poet argues for the stronger claim of the northern clans on the kingship of Ireland. His southern opponent makes light of such an argument:

Do bhréagnughadh a n-abra—gion gurbh fíú an chúis a tagra—gairmthear ór rioghraidh mar sin Banbha Bhriain, Inis Éibhir.

Anmanna ghairmid filidh mar fairsinge dá slighidh—mó is anbhfann an tagra soin mar aighneas ceart ar dhúthaigh.

*Do nós an dána, a Aodh, ós aos dána sinn araon,
do féadfainn, dámadh áil linn, Tír Aodha do ghairm d'Éirinn.¹*

mar fairsinge dá slighidh might be rendered 'to amplify their line'.² This candid avowal is sufficient to explain the usage as we find it; and its origin presents no difficulty. We find even in a certain class of modern writers such rhetorical 'kennings' as 'the land of Shakespeare', 'the birthplace of Nelson', etc. for England, and of course there would be no difficulty in finding parallels in older literatures.

‡ the name of a part of Ireland, generally an ancient court or place of assembly, is used to denote the whole. In this usage Teamhair 'Tara', the seat of the ancient capital, is of course very frequent, and also its various poetic names—Cathair Chröinn, Druim Caoin, Liathdruim, Tulach an Trir, Tulach na d'Tri bhFear, etc. Breagha 'Bregia', the tribal name of the territory in which Tara is situated, is perhaps the commonest of all, both independently, as in sluagh Breagh, or after any of the nouns of location given above. Frámhainn, 'Frewin', Oileach, Cruachain, 'Croghan', Uisneach, Taille, Tlachtgha. Ráth Frámhann, 'the Castle of Frewin', Ráth Oiligh', etc., are also common. River names are frequent as 'territorial adjectives', (see above p. LVI) but only of the Boyne can we safely affirm that it is used figuratively for Ireland; and this usage is well established. It is easily explained from the situation of the river, and the associations of its valley.

Along with these epithets for the country go similar ones for the people thereof; Irishmen may be referred to by sluagh, pobal, etc. followed by any of the names used to denote the country; or by aicme, clann, crú, frámh, fuil, stol, sliocht, etc. followed by the name of any of the ancient kings.

A name which seems to have no parallel is that in which the qualifying element is Gréag, 'of the Greeks', or 'Grecian'. Irishmen are often Gaoidhil Gréag. O'Grady, annotating a line from Ó Heódhúsa in which the westernmost point of Ireland is referred to as rinn iarthair inse Grég, remarks.—'Why Ireland should be towed round from the Atlantic to the Egean is not self-evident; perhaps the poet under tyranny of 'verszwang' grasps at the fact that she contained Geraldines.' (Cat. 454, note). This may be the correct explanation; as to the Grecian origin ascribed to the Fitzgeralds, see note on 17 § 9, but it might also be a reminiscence of the Grecian sojourn ascribed to some of the early invaders of Ireland in Lebar Gabála.

Bardic names for various parts of Ireland, for different septs and clans Subdivisions of the country have also distinctive epithets, as Leath Cuinn for the northern portion of Ireland, Leath Mogha for the southern, a reminiscence of the division attributed to Conn the Hundredfighter and Eóghan Mór. Munster may be Magh Maicniadh, from Maicnia, a Munster chief; Connacht, Fonn Oilill, from Oilill, husband of Meadhbh, or Clár Meadhbha, from Meadhbh herself. The people of Munster may be referred to as aicme, etc. Bloil, Briain, Cais, Meic Cou, Táil, etc.; those of Connacht as Clann Chuinn, etc., and so on. Similarly each family provides in its geographical situation and its genealogical tree opportunity for many allusive epithets.

The O'Donnells are siol Dálaigh, 'the seed of Dálach', grandfather of the man from whom they are surnamed; clann Chonaill, from their ancestor Conall Galban, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages;
 the O'Neills are Eóghanaigh, siol Eóghain, from their ancestor Eóghan, son of the same Niall; the Maguires siol gColla, siol Duinn, clann Síadna, etc. the O'Rourkes siol bhFearghna; the Burkes siol Séarlais, 'seed of Charles or Charlemagne', and so on.

Conventional phrasing

When the ideas to be expressed are conventional the phrasing naturally tends towards stereotyped patterns, and we find the court poets very often repeating themselves and each other with very little variation. TD is on the whole remarkably sparing in padding and tags, but we find in his poems some curious repetitions and echoes; such as I have been able to identify are dealt with in the Notes as they occur. Further parallels may be discovered when more bardic poetry is published. Undoubtedly the memorization of a large number of tags and 'frame'-sentences formed an important and considerable item in the training of the bardic poet.

Certain descriptive passages seem to reflect literary tradition rather than the actual life of the period. For instance, while there is nothing inconceivable in the description in 11 § 16 of the satin-clad ladies weaving golden fringes in Enniskillen castle, the fact that the same item is found not only in poets of two centuries before, but is common in the romantic tales, makes us reluctant to accept it as evidence on Irish customs of the late 16th century.

A few devices for surmounting the difficulties of the metre may be mentioned. There are tags for filling up the line, such as phrases with dia do—, lór do— 'enough of', and the epithets classified above are very frequently used purely on metrical grounds. A favorite contrivance for managing direct narrative in the fourlined stanza is to place the third line in parenthesis, often subsequent in sense to the fourth, e. g., 2 §§ 15, 23, 24. The sentence thus introduced is usually of purely metrical value, adding nothing to the sense, and we often find for the purpose conventional phrases repeated with slight variation, not only by the same poet in various places, but by different poets. Compare, for instance TD 2 § 25 with 2 § 40, and also with:

Ní hinbheithe dá ghruaidh ghloin 'na aon i n-aghaidh phoboil—laoich na ngreadh síodhbhuainmhear seang—ag storbhuidhreachd fear nÉireann.

E. O Heódhusa, 23 L 17, 94 b.

Similes, figures, apologues, etc.

Similes, like epithets, tend to become conventional and stereotyped. Some are peculiarly Irish, others, such, for instance, as the Biblical expression — 'numberless as the stars of the sky, the sands of the sea', can be traced to external sources. The chief's superiority to his fellows is illustrated by likening him to the full moon with the stars about her; he surpasses others as gold surpasses bronze, as the sea exceeds the tiny pool, as the hill rises above the level plain. To attack him is likened to such foolhardy enterprises as sticking one's head into a lion's den, storming a blazing house; thrusting the hand into a griffin's nest to steal her first brood, rousing a brown bear, tormenting a dog through her puppies, plundering laden bees, robbing treasure from fairy castles, etc. Most of these are also found in the annals and other prose literature, at an early period; cf the second Battle of Moytura § 127 RC 12. War spreads from place to place, from clan to clan, as houses take fire from one another; an ominous figure. Figures and comparisons from native history and mythology are frequent, all the 'cattleforays, wooings and destructions', are evidently ready to the poet's hand as illustrative material, to be used either in passing reference or in the form of elaborate apologues, as for instance, the references to Niall of the Nine Hostages and to Brian Boru in 1; the story of Maol Miolscothach in 3, and that of Eóghan Mór in 31. Foreign literature is also drawn upon; the fate of Troy is a favorite illustration of the evils of national or family disunion; the portents of approaching battle detailed in 4 are taken over from the Irish version of Lucan's Pharsalia, and the curious story of Caesar in 24 seems to be a garbled rendering of another incident described in the same document. We have also a curious version of the story of Daedalus. Apologues of Scriptural origin are not wanting, the judgment of Solomon is used in 3. In 1 we have a story taken from the Irish version of Mandeville, in 15 the story of the emperor and the three birds.

The beneficial influence of a rightful ruler is usually pictured in stereotyped phrases with little reference to actualities; the chief pacifies the raging sea; the trees of the forest bend down to him in reverence; the earth yields her fruits in abundance, even before their due season; the weather is all that can be wished for; the voice of one's fellow sounds in the ears as sweetly as harpstrings; and so forth. These ideas are found current at a very early period of Irish literature, and are evidently a reminiscence of ancient belief. See Baudiš, on the kingship of Tara, Ériu 8, and the ancient text Teccosca Morainn, ed. Thurneysen ZfCP 11, 89 where many of these signs of a righteous prince are detailed.¹ Sometimes, however, the ascribed benefits are more within the compass of human endeavor; though one may feel doubtful of the competency of any Irish chieftain of the period to bring about the happy conditions attributed to the wisdom of Turlogh Luineach in 7, and to that of MacWilliam Burke in 17.

Hyperbole

Apart from the more conventional kind which is seldom quite lacking in any encomium we can distinguish two special methods of hyperbolical writing; in the first the feats, attributes and even the goods and chattels of the chief are detailed in one of the stricter metres, in a deliberate and studied style of exaggeration, calculated to impress the ear and the mental vision by a series of bold, yet intricate and cunningly-wrought images. A good example of this is 10. The other, which also accompanies the simpler styles of versification, consists in a generally extravagant comparison, and is often frankly humorous; as an example we can take 7.

Love-poetry.

We have two love-poems attributed to TD. This kind of verse has, as readers of Professor O'Rahilly's Dánta Grádha will notice, its own characteristic similes and conceits. The examples by TD are both of the Aisling, or 'Vision' type so common in later days as a vehicle for political sentiment.

¹ That this document was used in the bardic schools down to the end of the sixteenth century, at least, is proved by the quotations from it in the Contention of the Bards.

They are interesting as early specimens of the form, before it had become associated with 'Charley-over-the-waterism'. The pattern in its main lines is that of the 18th century poems; the poet describes in detail the beautiful apparition, and then, reciting a list of mysterious ladies whose fatal charms wrought havoc and desolation to famous warriors of other days, asks if the lovely one be any of these. The climax, however, shows an important difference. The lady, so far from revealing herself as Eire, vanishes without making any reply. A similar piece, but lacking the interrogatory matter, is printed in Dánta Grádha p. 39.

Humor

The poet is not afraid sometimes to consider his subject from a humorous point of view, though his pleasantries are always restrained within the boundaries fixed by good taste. For instance 31 is a specimen of playful elaboration of a well-known theme, and we also have, unfortunately in a fragmentary and sadly corrupt state, an example of the literary species called croántacht, in which a series of extravagantly complimentary stanzas in the artistic sníadhbhairdne metre is interspersed with humorous anecdotes, some of which have doubtless lost a good deal of the savor they owned at the time of their first declamation. The croántacht reminds us very strongly of that kind of modern music-hall performance in which the verses of a comic song are broken here and there by spoken extemporizations technically known as 'patter'; indeed it is difficult to resist the conclusion that the Irish croántacht stands in direct genealogical relation to this style of entertainment. It would also be of interest to consider on the other hand the relation of the croántacht to those older romances where the prose is interspersed with verses elaborating some part of the narrative. However, this takes us beyond our present subject.

Nature poetry

A feeling for nature—for the beauties of hill and valley, river, lake and sea, has long been regarded as a characteristic feature of Celtic poetry, though whether this feature is not typical rather of a period of development than of a particular race is debateable.¹ In bardic poetry we have undoubtedly plenty of evidence of a healthy pleasure in natural things, blue hills, green valleys, murmuring streams, singing of birds, and so on; but the conventional phraseology, the vagueness—to modern readers at any rate—of the adjectives, and the not infrequent literary irrelevance of the references, tends to rob these ostensible appreciations of natural beauty of the vivifying spontaneity which we find in the earlier Irish nature-poetry. Naturally the court poetry was not used as a vehicle for expressing the poet's attitude towards nature. Its function was to compliment a person and to this function it was strictly limited. Thus references to scenery have, generally speaking, been brought into line with the personal epithets and compliments; and many descriptions and adjectives, which, could we regard them in isolated passages, without looking 'before and after', would impress us as being truly poetical, are shown by a perusal of several poets of various ages to be as conventional and petrified as any journalistic cliché of the present day. Nevertheless an instinctive affection for the natural features of the poet's native land is luminous in many passages. The references to blue hills and murmuring streams, brown foliage and spreading plains, gentle breezes and melody of birds, have a redolence of the country which the conventional use of them cannot entirely dispel. What pleases one more than anything else in bardic poetry is the poet's affectionate knowledge of the natural aspect of his own land, and perhaps the most sincere verse we possess in the style is that in which the exile mourns for his native scenes. "Well known to me", wrote John Mitchel, "by day and by night are the voices of Ireland's winds and waters, the faces of her ancient mountains. I see it, I hear it all—for by the wondrous power of imagination, informed by strong love, I do indeed live more truly in Ireland than on these unblest rocks."¹ This is in the genuine spirit of Gaelic poetry, even as we find it in many a line of Giolla Brighde Ó Heódhusa and Fearghal Óg Mhac an Bhaird, and as it briefly appears in:

*sás ionnarbtha orchra is fearr—
tolcha iongantá Éireann.*

THE LANGUAGE OF THE POEMS

As already stated, the language of bardic poetry remains practically unchanged throughout the period 1250-1650.¹ In prose it is represented in its general manuscript aspect by, e. g., Keating's Forus Feasa. It is elaborately described in the early 16th century grammatical tracts which are being edited by Professor Bergin as a supplement to Ériu,² and until these are all in print any attempt at a complete description of this form of Irish is idle. A brief notice, however, of the main features which distinguish it from Old Irish on the one hand, and the language of the present day on the other will be desired by readers who are unacquainted with the subject.³

It is not an artificial dialect, sprinkled with monstrous pseudo-archaisms in the style of the O'Clerys and Tadhg O Cianáin. Apart from pronunciation, it will be found that it is in some respects on a line with Irish of the 9th century, while in others it is more advanced than the most widely spoken modern dialects.

PRONUNCIATION

Vowels

The Old Irish quantities are regularly preserved. The o in ord is equal to that in colg. As the Irish metrist considers a vowel in the interior of a word in relation to the consonant or consonant-group which follows it we cannot state precisely that the vowel of ord had the same value as that of tol, for instance, but it was certainly not equal to that in óg. A perfect rime

¹ The present historical arrangement of Irish: O. Ir. up to 1100, Mid. Ir. 1100-1500, and Modern Ir. 1500—needs revision. Muireadhach Albanach and Donnchadh Mór did not write in Middle Irish, but in Early Modern Irish, and this period of the language may surely be dated from 1250. It is to be hoped that competent Irish scholars will soon decide upon an accurate division of the periods of the language.

² Irish Grammatical Tracts, edited by Osborn Bergin, Supplement to Ériu 8 seq. Henceforth referred to as Ir. Gr. Tr.

is formed by ordaibh and colgaibh; neither of these would rime with ógbhaidh or fógraibh. In fact for metrical purposes three quantities are distinguished in the grammatical tracts; sineadh gearr 'short quantity' as fear 'man'; s. meadhónach 'middle quantity' as fearr 'better', and s. fada 'long quantity', as féar 'grass'.¹ That the three quantities were recognized in the Old Irish period has been suggested by Thurneysen, Handbuch p. 30.

Consonants

Every consonant, lenited or not, must have its full value, initially, interiorly and finally.² Broad and slender sounds generally as in the modern language. For initial mutation see p. XCVIII infra.

Dialectical variations in verb-endings

In the verb certain personal endings diverge dialectically, e. g. the vocalic endings of the 2nd sg. and pl. in some tenses, the endings of the 1st pl. pres. and imperf. ind., past subj., fut. and sec. fut.; the endings of 1st and 3rd pl. imperf. ind., past subj. and sec. fut. For examples see paradigms, p. LXXIII infra. The form used is determined by metre when the word is rimed, in other cases the poet would probably use the dialect spoken by the chief he was addressing, but we have no certain information on this point, and the scribes follow their own fancy.

Dialectical variations in stressed vowels

There are innumerable cases of Old Irish vowels and diphthongs developing in different directions dialectically. Thus we get doublets like, bos, bas; cloch, clach; cogadh, cagadh; talamh, tolamh; creidim, croidim; tulach, tealach; óg, ág; fód, fád; cóir, cáir; onóir, anáir; fáilidh, faoilidh; triplets like óidh, úidh, aoidh; carradh, orradh, urradh, etc., etc. These variations were not invented for metrical convenience; the grammarians point out that in some words only one form is allowed, e. g. lach, a form used by TD in one passage, for loch 'lake', is denounced in

² For some interesting remarks on the pronunciation of consonants see Bergin's paper on alliteration, Ériu 9, 82.

Ir. Gr. Tr., Decl. p. 81. Only such forms as were well established in use were countenanced. As in O. Ir. we find -ó- and -ua- interchanging in some words, e. g. fógra, fuagra.

Dialectical variations in consonants

We have also dialectical variations in treatment of consonants in certain words e. gg., raghaidh, rachaidh; tiaghair, tiachair; fochair, foghair; stoth, stódh; báidhim, báithim; fáidh, fáith etc.

ACCIDENCE

Article

The article is generally as in literary modern Irish. Eclipsis after the acc. sg. appears sometimes in good manuscripts, e. g.: Níor thógaibh . . . an súil gcuirr 8. 95, tú thaibhgeas an dtromchánaidh 27. 110.

Noun

The neut. gender is no longer recognized,¹ Neut. -o and -io stems are generally treated as masc., but a large number of nouns of all genders with vocalic ending of ns. have changed their O. Ir. gender in some dialects and are found both masc. and fem. Moreover, as nouns of the -io, -iā decl. resembled in ns. or as. such words as file, teanga (fili, tengae), they are in many cases declined both as vocalic and dental stems. There are on the other hand cases of nouns with an old ns. in -edh or -adh, developing a new ns. in -e or -a, and appearing both in the vocalic and dental declensions. Neuter -s stems, as sliabh, magh, are sometimes declined in pl. like dental stems. Other noteworthy declensional developments are the passing of certain -n stems into the -o decl. when the ns. ended in a consonant; e. g. talamh, gs. talmhan or talaimh; the decl. of -r stems in pl. on the pattern of calhair or teanga; e. g. athair, gp. athar, aithreach or aithreadh. These changes, with many others of interest, can be studied in Ir. Gr. Tr.

¹ Neut. -s stems are usually masc. e. g. magh and teagh are declined as masc., but recognized as anomalous, see Ir. Gr. Tr., Decl. § 31 and cf. ib. Intr. § 72.

Adjective

Of the form of the adjective there is nothing particular to notice save that the predicate adj. is sometimes found in agreement with pl. noun, e. g. is mbir na molta 10. 59.¹

Uses of cases

A characteristic feature of bardic poetry is the use of nom. for voc. sg. in certain declensions. This is dealt with at length by Professor Bergin in Ériu 9, 92 sq. For the acc. as direct object of the verb see infra p. c. Nouns which have an acc. sg. form differing from n. sg., as fem. -ā- stems, usually take it when direct object of verb e. g. 1. 80, 3. 100. See on this point p. c. infra. After a fem. noun in acc. sg. the adj. is regularly attenuated, e. g., 8. 94-5. As to dat. and acc. after preps. the usage differs little from that of O. Ir. The 15th cent. grammarians still distinguish three classes of preps., those with dat., those with acc., and those with dat. or acc., according to meaning of preceding verb; d'fíor, um fear; rachad ar an cnoc, atá fear na rioth ar an chnuc, are given as exx, Ir. Gr. Tr., Introd. §§ 73-4. In the pl., however, the distinction is not consistently upheld, while, e. g., fíor is not permitted after le or tar, there is no objection to fearaibh in such a case (8. 48, 15. 95, 7. 43). The Irish grammarians of the 15th century did not attempt to fit their language into the scheme of the Latin grammar; what is now commonly described as a prep. with dat. they call tairmbérta chuireas feirinnsgne a tuillréim 'a particle which puts a masc. noun into the dative.' In fact the rendering of tuillréim by dative here is rather convenient than accurate. A fem. word, having usually the same form for dat. and acc. sg., took the same form in the sg. after each class of prep. But actually the only masc. nouns thus affected are monosyllabic -o- stems, a few consonantal stems, and -s- stems such as magh, teagh.

The acc. of respect is common with adjj., e. g. is é is fearr ceart 20. 39. The O. Ir. dat. of apposition still occurs, though not always distinguishable in form. A curious use of n. pl. in apposition appears in 24. 136.

¹ I refer to lines of poems throughout this section.

The attributive gen. is exceedingly common; gein sochair 'fortunate offspring', 17. 126; also in pl.; dod ghnúis gruaith nglan 'to thy bright-cheeked countenance', 19. 3. There are exx. of what we might call the gen. of possible action: Ion caomhanta bhruaigh Bhanbha 'enough to defend the shores of B.', 20. 219; cf. 19. 11. There are several exx. of the identifying gen., as seabhadh eich 'a steed swift as a hawk', 6. 49; mionn leabhair 'a precious book', 25. 110.

With predicate adj. the gen. of respect is common, and is regularly eclipsed: ar mbeith ollamh n-ealadhan, 3. 36, fear dob aithreamhail n-aignidh, 17. 148, fear . . . dob féarr n-iomchuir 25. 55.

Compound nouns and adjectives

A characteristic feature of Early Modern Irish literature is the lavish use of compounds, nominal and adjectival. A nominal compound may be formed by two nouns, of which the first has then an adjectival force, as, cladhachadh 'dyked meadow'; or of an adjective and a noun, as, gealmhagh 'bright plain'. An adjectival compound may be formed by a noun and an adjective, the former having an adverbial force, as, créachtadoiligh 'troublesome as to wounds', 'sorely wounding'; collbhán 'white in respect of hazels', 'having white hazels', 'white-hazeled'; or of two adj. of which the first may have an adverbial or adjectival force, e. g., buanasdrach 'ever-roving', fuairfliuch 'cold and wet'.

Some points are to be noted in the construction of artificial compounds: the initial of a word in the interior, or at the end of a compound determines the quality of the final of the preceding constituent, e. g. gnúis + náir > gnúsnáir; gné + bán > gnéabhán.

A word in composition regularly lenites the initial of the following constituent, but d and t are naturally not lenited by d, n, t, l, or s, and m does not lenite b or p; -mb-, -nd-, -ld-, may if it suits the metre become -m-, -n-, -l-. There is no need to devote any more space to these points here as they are elaborately dealt with in Ir. Gr. Tr., Introd. §§ 30 seq. One thing more may be noted: when certain -t or -k stems appear initially or interiorly in a compound the stem consonant may be retained or dropped, according to metrical exigency, e. g. rt + múr may be ríomhúr or ríoghmhúr; abhra + dubh may be abhradhúbh or abhradubh (abhrad-dubh), e. g. l. 102, 154.

The lenited forms of the first and second person sg. are not regularly distinguished by the scribes and in the printed text I have followed in each case the best reading available. The general usage was apparently to lenite when the pronoun was the direct object of a verb or in 'disjunctive' position. As regards the third sg. and pl. the forms without s-are used when the pron. is the direct object of the verb. They can also be used as subj. of certain intransitive verbs. In other positions the s-forms are usual (e. gg. 3. 183; 10. 65, 120, 159; 16. 21, 109; 26. 24). In the first and second pl. the forms with and without s-appear to be used indiscriminately, save that after the comparative (i)ná the s-form only is correct. In the emph. forms of the third sg. and pl. -s(e)an seems to represent a confusion of O. Ir. -som, sium; Mid. Ir. -sem, with demons. sin, soin. In meaning it corresponds not only to -som, but also performs the functions of O. Ir. -side. Apparently -séin is a contamination of -side and féin (cf. Mid. Ir. sidhein). We also find it after some of the pronominal forms of the preps. di, do, i n- and re (= O. Ir. fri, ía). In meaning it is not distinct from -s(e)an.

The use of 2^d pl. for sg. in address is very common, but frequently the metre determines the form.

¹ riamh (e. g. 18. 15) has at this period simply an adverbial force; the suffixes of the 3rd pers. found in the pronominal forms of this prep. are evidently taken from those of um. It is interesting to note that this influence has spread still further in some of the spoken dialects, where e. g. roimhe > ruimi.

The Verb

It is sufficient to give a) the normal pattern of two weak verbs to illustrate the personal endings in broad and slender stems which occur in the text, and b) a list of strong verbal forms found in TD. Of the verbs in -ighim it need only be noted that the fut. stem may end in -éoch, -éogh, -ích, -égh or -(a)ighf, and the verbal noun in -achadh, -ochadh, -aghadh, -oghadh or -ughadh. Peculiarities in the conjugation of individual verbs will be noticed in the Glossarial Index as they occur in TD. The forms preceded by hyphen are found after neg. and interrog. particles, the conj. go, dá; a n- what, all that; the prepositional relative, the verbal prefixes do-, ro-.

Preterite and Perf.

There is no longer any consistent syntactical distinction between these two tenses, but in narrative the O. Ir. absolute form of the 3rd sg. -s-pret, saorais, fillis (without pron.) is usual in non-rel. position when no conj. part. precedes. In the other persons of sg. and pl. the particle do or ro is regularly prefixed in the absence of any other conj. particle.

Analytic Conjugation

Any verb may be conjugated by adding to the 3rd sg. of each tense the personal pronoun required, e. g. 2nd pl. pres. ind. saoraidh sibh etc.; but in the pret. and perf. only the forms like do saor, do fill can be so used with pron. The 3rd pl. may be saoraid siad or saoraidh siad e. g. 10. 120, 16. 247. The vowel of the verbal particle do is not elided before f or a vowel (Ir. Gr. Tr., Intr. § 73; ib. Pref. p. iii).

Irregular Verbs.

Many verbs which were strong in O. Ir. have a common verbal stem throughout the conjugation, e. g. beanaim, féirim (O. Ir. fo-riuth). On the other hand some features such as the -ē-fut. have spread to originally weak verbs; while weak verbs of certain classes have such distinctive future formations that in a practical grammar it would be necessary to class them apart from those of the ordinary weak conjugation. Here I only give, as they occur in TD, the forms of the genuine strong verbs which still show stem variation; together with the few isolated forms which occur. Illustrative references are added, but these are not exhaustive.

Verbal noun

beith, bheith pass.

Participle of necessity

beite 28. 119.

The form gi bé (MSS. also gidh bé) 'whoever, anyone, any', seems to be in origin a confusion of the pres. subj. of the copula and following pron. with the pres. subj. conj. of the subst. verb.

Copula

A brief note on this verb is enough, as practically all the forms occurring in the text will be found in the Introduction to Bergin's *Stories from Keating's History*¹. In the following summary (c) indicates that the initial of the following word is regularly lenited; (h-) is suffixed to forms which prefix h- to a following vowel; forms with hyphen prefixed, as -r are suffixed to rel. preps., neg. particles etc. The preps. do, ag, usually become da (dá), ga (gá) respectively before the rel. + copula.

¹ See also Contention of the Bards, Introd.

Present is, s, rel. is, is^{c1}, -n h-, -r h-, a h-, ar-, h.

Pres. Subj. rob, rab, -dh, -b; with gé, gémadh, gi(o)dh; ci(o)dh; with dá, dámadh; with go, gomadh.

Past Subj. budh, -dh; with gé etc., as in Pres. Subj.

Future. bu h-, budh, budh h-, rel. bhus.

Sec. Fut. budh, budh^c, -rbh^c, -r^c.

Past. fa, budh^c, dob^c, rob^c, -rbh^c, r^c.

The forms of the copula being invariably unstressed we have no check on the tendency of the scribe to substitute another form for that in his exemplar; thus dob or budh; dan or dar or darbh; len or ler, appear in the same place in different copies. The past subj., fut., sec. fut. and past have all an independent form budh (MS. usually b-); the past and sec. fut. also fall together in the suffixed forms. It is often impossible to decide whether a form is to be parsed as sec. fut. or modal past, e. g. 10. 54.

Pres. Ind. Sg. 1 -abraim 3. 69, 10. 44. 2 adeire 1. 127
3 adir 10. 135, 15. 133. Pl. 1 'dearmaoid (v. l. deirmíd) 2. 37

PROSODY

An intimate knowledge of Irish prosody can only be gained by careful observation of examples, and a study of the Irish Grammatical Tracts.¹ The prosody of Middle Irish verse, such as the early religious poems, is not altogether the same as that of the dán díreach used by the court poets during the period 1250-1650.² Saltair na Rann is certainly in strict metre, yet it is swarming with things—obviously legitimate at that period—which would not have been tolerated during the later one. While the laws as to what constitutes rime, alliteration etc. are, with a few minor exceptions, the same for both periods, the use of these ornaments is in our period subject to more stringent regulations. I shall summarize them briefly for the metres used by TD:

Dán díreach

Before describing the different metres a few rules which are common to all the dán díreach metres must be mentioned: The last two words of each stanza must alliterate. Each line must end with a fully stressed word. The conclusion of the poem should recall the opening word.

deibhidhe

EXX. 1-5, 7-9, 12-15, 17-21, 22a-24, 26-28, 30-33, 36-39, 40-42, 44

This is the commonest of the dán díreach metres, being by far the easiest of them all (with all due respect to Francis O'Molloy and his echoers).

¹ See for the elements of the subject Meyer's Primer of Irish Metrics and O'Molloy's De Prosodia Hibernica, ed., with trans., by T. Ó Flannghaile 1908. Some inaccuracies in Meyer's Primer are corrected in Metrica, a series of papers on Irish prosody, by Osborn Bergin, Ériu 8—9; T. Ó Flannghaile's notes are not always accurate, neither is his translation quite reliable. He does not show any first hand knowledge of Irish prosody. Metrica includes an interesting and valuable paper on alliteration.

² e. g. in the 10th century slat and smacht could pass as a rime; and possibly there are cases of 'alliteration for the eye,' though what value this could have in verse composed for recitation is not clear.

The requisites are: four lines in each stanza; seven syllables in each line; rinn and airdrinn between the lines of each couplet; at least two internal rimes in the second couplet; two alliterating words in each line.

stádna

Exx. 11, 25, 29

Four lines in each stanza; eight syllables in 1st and 3rd lines, seven in 2nd and 4th; the 1st and 3rd lines end in dissyllables, the 2nd and 4th in monosyllables; the last words of 2nd and 4th lines rime; there are two internal rimes between the 3rd and 4th lines, and the last word of the 3rd line rimes with the accented word preceding the last word of the 4th; two alliterating words in each line, and also alliteration between the last word of the 1st line and the first accented word of the 2nd.

dian midhseang, also called stádna mór

Ex. 16

Four lines in each stanza; eight syllables in 1st and 3rd lines, seven in 2nd and 4th; 1st and 3rd lines end in dissyllables, 2nd and 4th in trisyllables; the last words of the 2nd and 4th lines rime; there is one internal rime between 3rd and 4th lines and the last word of the 3rd line rimes with the accented word preceding the last word of the 4th; two alliterating words in each line, the last two alliterating in the 4th, and also alliteration between the last word of the 1st line and the first accented word of the 2nd.

rannuigheacht mhór

Ex. 37

Four lines in each stanza; seven syllables in each line; each line ends in a monosyllable; the last words of all four lines consonate¹ with each other; the last words of the 2nd and 4th lines rime; there are two internal rimes between the 3rd and 4th lines, and two internal rimes or assonances, according to pleasure, between the 1st and 2nd; the last word of the 3rd line rimes with a word in the 4th; two alliterating words in each line.

¹ For consonance see Ériu 6, 103 sq., and the paper by Thurneysen referred to ib. p. 154.

rannuigheacht bheag

Exx. 6, 10

The rules are the same as those for rannuigheacht mhór, save that each line ends in a dissyllable.

snéadhbhairdne

Ex. 34

This is a very artistic metre, of a class used a good deal in the earlier dán díreach for religious verse, In later years it is usually confined to the half-humorous species of eulogy called croántacht, the verse being interspersed with prose anecdotes (see D. Ó Bruadair i p. 91). Each stanza contains as a rule 48 syllables; sometimes the number is 60 or 72. The normal pattern is a fourlined stanza of which the 1st and 3rd lines have eight syllables and the 2nd and 4th four; each line ends in a dissyllable; the last words of the 2nd and 4th lines rime; there is at least one internal rime between the 3rd and 4th lines: the endings of the 2nd, 3rd and 4th lines consonate¹; the 1st, 3rd and 4th lines have each two alliterating words, in the 4th, as usual, the two final words are the alliterating ones; in the 2nd line alliteration is not necessary, but the last word of the 1st line must alliterate with the first word of the 2nd.²

Óglachas

Exx. 22, 38, 42

This kind of versification is an imitation of dán díreach. The rime is imperfect, comhardadh briste. Any dán díreach metre may be imitated in this style. We have óglachas of rannuigheacht mhór in 22, of r. bheag in 38. There is one internal rime in ¹ Where alliteration between the 1st and 2nd lines is necessary, only the 2nd, 3rd and 4th lines consonate, as in snéadhbhairdne and rinnaird (see O'Gr., Cat. 487, Ir. Monthly July 1921, for an example of rinnaird of this period).

² Óglachas is not to be confused with brúilingeacht; the latter is regular and strict in its rules, the former is the barest imitation of dán díreach, without any strict rules of rime, alliteration, or consonance. For examples of brúilingeacht see Studies 1920, p. 416, Miscell. Celt. Soc. p. 328. Ossianic poems are generally in óglachas, and most of the poems in the Contention of the Bards are of this species.

each couplet; usually the last word of a, c, riming with one in b, d, respectively.

Stressed metres

In this collection there is one poem in stressed metre, 35. Unfortunately it has been very corruptly transmitted. For a discussion of the form see the Notes on the poem.

Irregularities

In one case an unriming stressed word is permitted between two riming words in the second couplet; in such phrases as ceann i gceann, druim ar druim, etc. the first word, though making alliteration, need not always have a rime in the next line, e. gg. 21. 15; 27. 151; 30. 35.

When f is preceded by the copula form -rbh it may be treated for alliterating purposes as ḟ or bhf- according to metrical exigency; e. gg. 22a. 37, 44. 41.

The hand, though extremely neat and pleasing, is not a scholarly one, that is, it does not suggest that the writer had been educated in the tradition of the native schools. § 8

FORMATION OF TEXT, AND CRITICAL APPARATUS

1. Orthography

The MSS. range in date from the last quarter of the 16th century to the earlier part of the 19th. They vary in orthography, not only from one to another, but internally. During the period in which these MSS. were compiled there was no fixed standard of orthography, as the expression is understood nowadays. The bardic academy which controlled the literary usage from the 13th to the 17th century had a certain standard, which can be studied in the grammatical tracts of the period. This style is followed fairly closely, with more punctilious indication of mutation and historical quantity, in good 17th century

MSS., such as RIA A iv 3. In editing these poems I considered it most convenient, from all points of view, to normalize the spelling throughout to a standard based generally on the classical pronunciation, historical correctness and the usage of the best MSS. The following changes, and extensions of compendia have been made silently. In cases of doubt the MS. reading has been included in the variants:

Text	MSS.
an (def. art.)	rarely in
ao, ia, ua	generally with a mark of length over the first letter; in the case of ao the mark is often over the o , or if i follows, over the latter.
bh medial	In a few words generally mh , e. gg. for congbháil , congmháil or connmháil ; for Éibhear , Éimhear .
bh final	in some of the later MSS. mh in a few words, e. g. lenamh , leinimh .
bhf initial	frequently ff ; usually bf or bfh
budh (fut., cond. or past of is)	usually b^h , sometimes bú or búdh .
dá conj., prep. + poss.,	often da
dan, dar (prep. + is)	sometimes dán, dár
dh medial or final, whether preceded by vowel or consonant	often gh
dl initial	generally ll
e final	e or i indiscriminately.
ea, ei	the general usage is e or ea before broad consonants, ei before slender. In either case the tall e or the ordinary form may be used, but the tall e is rare when ea is written.
éa	é, e, éa, éu, éu; é being the favorite in more scholarly MSS. In some vellum MSS., where the mark of length is regularly omitted e = éa ; while short e before a broad consonant is written ea . See Ir. Gr. Tr., Introd. § 11. The tall e is sometimes used for éa by 18th century scribes, not so in better MSS.; see Ir. Gr. Tr., Pref. p. iii.

fa prep. gov. acc. fa, fo prep. gov. dat. and acc.	} often fá , whether simple or combined with art. or poss.
fa past tense of copula
fiarfaigh-	often fá .
g final or medial	fiafraigh- more usual
gá interrog.	sometimes cc
gc initial	often ga
gh final or medial	usually cc
gi bé, ci bé	often dh
i (n -) prep.	gidh bé, cidh bé very frequent
-io -io-	regularly a , whether independent or combined with poss., etc.
is copula	usually -i-, -í-
	is and as are written quite indiscriminately; the latter is on the whole more frequent. The O. Ir. distinction between is (abs.) and as (rel.) was moribund in the 10th cent. and undoubtedly dead by the 13th; therefore to maintain the distinction in printing 16th cent. compositions would be a meaningless and misleading pedanticism.
is conj.	sometimes as
l	often doubled, unhistorically, before l, r , e. gg. Tailltean, Callraighe .
le simple prep., or prep. + poss., etc.	le or lé indiscriminately; similarly re, ré; tre, tré
mac meic	usually mc , or m with bar. Thus it is difficult to ascertain the rules for lenition when a proper name follows. The best course in this matter is, I think, to follow the usage of a scholarly scribe, early enough in period to possess the recognized literary tradition, and late enough to discard the greater part of the compendia which render the vellums often useless as guides in such matters. Such a scribe was Seán Ó Maoil Chonaire (fl. c. 1650), whose usage can be seen in Bergin's Stories from Keating's History. He regularly lenites the initial of mac when the word comes between the christian name and the surname, e. g., Cormac mhac Airt. If mac forms part of the surname the initial is lenited when the christian name precedes, e. g., Diarmaid Mhac Murchadha. I have followed this usage, silently extending the compendium, and adding the lenition even when omitted in fully-written instances. See also the par. on lenition below.

Text

n medial

usually doubled before d, l, r, s, t. Hence innis, for inis 'island,' the -nn- which developed in contact with the -s- in the syncopated form being generalized.

nn medial or final sometimes nd.

ná, nó (nor, or) not regularly distinguished, and rarely having the mark of length.

nách dependent neg.

the mark of length is generally absent in the earlier MSS. and perhaps should not have been added. The form ná for dependent neg. prefix is very rare in the MSS. A few instances in A v I are all I have noticed.

nár dependent neg.

often nar.

ós prep.

often os; sometimes as.

r medial

usually doubled before ch, dh, gh, l, n, s, th when the preceding vowel is historically short; cf. Ir. Gr. Tr., Decl. p. 51, l. 12).

Text	MSS.
re prep.	see le
san prep.-art. } ' san conj. }	generally sa before consonants vowels	with regard to short vowels in unaccented syllables no consistent rule is followed in the MSS., and I have not attempted to form one, printing -ai , or ui ; io or -ea ; -a , -o , or -u , according to the copy on which the text is mainly based. Neither have I recorded such differences of spelling in the variants.
s- pret. sg. 3	the ending -ais , -is is usually replaced by -as e(a)s in late MSS.

Mutation of Initials

I divide this into two classes: a) syntactical; b) phonetic; a) is of course phonetic in origin, but after the laws under which it first took place ceased to operate it remained as a syntactical device, strengthened in the performance of its grammatical functions by the working of analogy. When I had completed the transcription of these poems one of the first editorial difficulties which presented itself was—how to act with regard to lenition and eclipsis. Even good 17th cent. MSS. are not always consistent, and while the majority of the later scribes usually follow their own dialect, consonant mutations, as well as quantity, are often unmarked, particularly in the earlier MSS. Normalization was obviously desirable, but to what standard? Would one be justified in imposing on 16th century compositions a system proper to Old Irish, but hardly likely to have been faithfully preserved in speech for eight centuries? As far as syntactical mutation is concerned I found the greater part of the difficulties solved in the most satisfactory way in the published portion of the Irish Grammatical Tracts, where it appears clearly that the early Irish usage had been preserved in its main features almost intact in the bardic schools.¹ The regular system of syntactical mutation, according to the usage of good MSS., and the teaching of the grammatical tracts, is outlined below. To this system I have adhered as a general rule. Such departures from it as may be noticed are either due to metrical exigency, or caused by reluctance to alter the MS. reading in particular cases.

Syntactical Mutation

a) lenition ¹

Lenition is regular after:

a vocative part.

a his.

b, ba, budh past tense of is.

d', dó prep.

dó, d', t' 'thy'.

fa (um); fa, fo preps.

is, rel. of copula. Lenition rarely shown in MSS. See below p. c.

má 'if.'

mar 'as', 'how'.

más 'if it is.'

ní neg. with active verb.

ó prep. and conj.

ós prep. (in the phrr. ós chionn, ós chomhair; ós ci., ós co. are very common even in good MSS., and this is a case where I have not usually restored lenition against all MSS.)

um prep.

-r, perfective, when the verb is active, occasionally when the verb is rel. pass.

² For a curious note on the lenition after gan see Ir. Gr. Tr., Intr. § 7.

an, article in nom. sg. fem., gen. sg. masc., and dat. sg.¹ of all genders. The acc. sg. fem. may lenite or eclipse; the latter is found occasionally, but lenition is more usual.

noun or adjective in nom. and voc. sg. fem., voc. sg.² and gen. sg. of masc. -o-stems, dat. sg. of all genders when the ending is consonantal, sometimes when it is vocalic. The acc. sg. fem. is generally followed by lenition; historically it should in all genders produce eclipsis, and this is sometimes shown in good MSS. But when the noun itself does not change for the acc. the adj. is usually left unchanged also. I have followed the best reading available in each instance.

Lenition of acc.

I have not lenited the object of the finite verb³ when such lenition was absent from the MS. and at the same time metrically unnecessary. On these two points the following passage in the Grammatical Tr. affords useful guidance: Gach ainm uathaidh no iollraidh feirinnsgne no baininnsne, cáol no leathan, a n-anann a réim, cóir a réim connsuine do dhéanamh no gan a dhéanamh mur so: dochúú fear, do-chúú fhear; bris súil gheal, bris shúil ngil. 'Every masc. or fem. noun, sing. or plur., slender or broad in ending, and with the same form for nom. and acc., may be lenited or not [when object of finite verb],' Gr. Tr., Introd. § 81; cf. §§ 128, 135.

Lenition after rel. verb

I have not restored lenition after rel. is when metrically unnecessary, but have shown it when metrically suitable whenever there was MS. authority. It is rarely shown in the MSS.

¹ See Strachan, Mid. Ir. Decl. pp. 41-4. In the classical language, while distinction between dat. and acc. is still fairly well maintained in sg., any prep. may be followed by the dat. in the pl. See supra p. LXVIII and Str., l. c. p. 42 yz. In TD 7. 97 we have an unquestionable case of eclipsis after the article in dat. sg.

² When the nom. sg. masc. is used for voc., there is no lenition. See Ériu 9, 92.

³ This is regular in early Irish, and in the citations in Ir. Gr. Tr. Metrically proven exx. are plentiful in bardic poetry. The separation of the object from the governing verb does not at this period prevent lenition, e. g. ní fuil dloibh fear a hiomchair, (sic leg., and dele notes on the line) Ériu 8, 193.

When metrically necessary it has of course been silently restored. Only in the cases of f, p, and s has the lenition any effect on the metre.¹

Lenition of verb in relative position

In the pres. and fut. tenses the initial of the active verb in rel. position is lenited, save when preceded by a particle which prevents lenition, e. g. nách.

In the other tenses the initial of a verb in rel. position is not lenited save when a leniting particle precedes.

At this period the only special rel. forms in use are those with the ending (e)as in the 3rd. sg. pres and fut. of simple verbs. These forms are regularly lenited in the MSS. Such forms as táid and tig when in rel. position are also lenited often enough to suggest that the omission of the dot is an irregularity, though the question is uncertain. Outside these tenses our only difficulty is with regard to the t-forms of old compounds in the perf., e. gg. tug, táinig. Simple verbs are always preceded in the perf. by some particle which would cause lenition in any case when the verb is active; the do-forms of compounds need not be considered, in the first place the accented part of the verb begins with a vowel, and if it began with a consonant the do- or ad- would cause lenition in any case when the verb is active. Though such a form as tug is sometimes lenited in later MSS. when rel., I have rarely noticed the lenition in early MSS., and it does not seem to be historically justified. Cf., however, Thurneysen, Handbuch 297 n. Late and un-scholarly scribes naturally write e. gg., thug, tháinig in all positions.

Two other uses of lenition may be mentioned here, as a practical distinction is involved. O'Donovan, Gramm. p. 56, and O'Grady, Oss. iii p. 299 state that ó (ua) and mac, when common nouns, not forming part of a proper name, lenite the initial of the personal name they govern; thus ó Fíloinn would mean 'grandson, or descendant of Flann,' but Ó Fíloinn 'O'Flynn;' mac Dhomhnaill 'Donnell's son,' but Mac Domhnaill 'MacDonnell.' This distinction, however, is not observed in the MSS. of these poems; in fact the personal name is rarely lenited after either mac or meic, so I have not altered the reading of the best MSS. in this case. Cf. note on mac above.

Elizabethan transcriptions such as 'James M'Connell,' 'Soirle M'Connell,' representing Stéamus Mhac Domhnaill (of the Isles), Somhairle Mhac Domhnaill do not suggest that the distinction was rigidly observed in the 16th century, but of course one cannot judge securely from Anglicised forms.

The second is also connected with the meaning of the word affected: place- and population-names in the gen. are usually lenited, without regard to the case of the preceding word. When the name consists of a noun denoting land or territory, such as crioch, fonu, fód, followed by a dependent proper name, or of fir, similarly followed, the first word is regularly lenited, e. g., láimh re hamhsaibh fuinn Bhanbha 4. 39; cf. 2. 100, 7. 99, 8. 96, 9. 129. Similarly when the dependent gen. fuinidh 'western' takes the place of the proper name, e. g., 10. 172. This lenition is not an invariable rule, cf. 9. 194, 17. 157 (coróin rioghachta bfer bFuil ZfcP 2, 333). In the text it has been restored, when absent, only when required by the metre. The same usage is sometimes found with such epithets as fear Banbha, e. g., re cneas chéile Logha 1. 51.

Irregular lenition after preps

Lenition after tar is very common in the MSS., and cases are noted in the variants. It is retained in the text as a rule only when established by metre, as in 21. 83.

Exceptions

Some of these, concerning individual words and particular constructions, are more conveniently dealt with in the Notes, as they occur in the text.

In accordance with the rules given in Ir. Gr. Tr.; Intro. § 50 sq. I have left generally unlenited

b, p,	when the preceding word ends in m
c, g,	" " " " " " c, ch, g, or gh
d, t,	" " " " " " d, n, t, l, or s ¹
m	" " " " " " m, mh

¹ But I have printed th-, dh- after -t, -d of the poss. sg. 2.

It may be noted here that in the language of bardic poetry only after the article an has lenited s the found of t; after all other words it has the sound of h; e. g. an tsleagh 'the spear,' but bean séimh 'a graceful woman', see Ir. Gr. Tr. Introd. §§ 68-9. In artificial compounds, however, medial lenited s is silent, see Ir. Gr. Tr., Introd. § 34, and note such rimes as séimhseang: Éireann 2. 104. O'Grady's note on lenited s, Cat. 437, is not quite accurate; the quiescence of s in this position being not merely a feature of the poet's local dialect, but common for at least four centuries to the literary language all over the country; as regular in the poems of the 14th century Munsterman, Gofraidh Fionn (e. g. seangslat: deagmhac GF vii 1) as in those of the 16th century Ulsterman Eochaidh Ó Heódhusa (toinnstrebb: airdnebh O'Gr., Cat. 470).

Eclipsis

In this case normalization is not so simple. Nasalization, or eclipsis, is in some positions a more violent change than lenition and while the latter has been spreading its activities the former has reduced them within a comparatively small area. In Early Irish the following forms were regularly followed by eclipsis of a following accented word:

- (1) acc. sg. and gen. pl. of art., adj. and noun, of all genders.
- (2) nom. sg. neut. of art., and nom. sg. of most neuter nouns.
- (3) the pl. poss. adjj.
- (4) the preps. co (go), with; ré n- before; the conjj. dá, go; a n- 'all that;' a n- rel.

also certain other forms which need not be mentioned here, as they were not in use in the classical form of the language. Forms producing eclipsis in the classical dialect, but not in the earlier language, are mentioned below.

As regards (1) eclipsis is regular in the MSS. with gen. pl. except when the word liable to affection is a proper name preceded by noun or adj.; with acc. sg. fairly regular when the noun is preceded by art., or art. and prep.; when the art. and prep. are absent eclipsis is not regularly shown, just as the adj. is not regularly changed in form. When the adj. follows a noun directly preceded by a prep. eclipsis is generally shown in good MSS. when the prep. is one of those which governed only the acc. in the earlier language; the distinction between ar with acc. and ar with dat. is also shown with fair regularity in good MSS., but I have not noticed any regular distinction in the case of i n-, although in Ir. Gr. Tr. Introd. §§ 73-5 the distinction between a bhfor, with the sense of rest in, and a bhfear with the sense of motion inwards is pointed out.¹ I have regularly restored eclipsis of the adj., if absent, when the noun is preceded by art. and prep. gov. acc.; in other cases I have given the most correct reading afforded by the MSS. For instance in such a phrase as gan toghail nduim, the n may be inserted on the authority of a single MS., but not if absent from all copies. Cases of obviously wrong eclipsis, e. g. ón bhfear have been invariably corrected, silently as a rule.

In (3), (4), eclipsis is naturally regular, though sometimes missing after the obsolescent ré n-, which in late MSS. is often confused with re < fri. (2) The eclipsis after nom. sg. neuter had been generally given up before our period, but traces are still preserved in a few cases; with beag, mór used substantively: beag dtarbha 9. 11, mór n-adhbhar 20. 210; in a few phrases: also in some tribal and place-names. In tribal names formed with siol, cinéal, e. gg. siol gColla; cinéal nEóghain, the eclipsis appears in some cases to have become stereotyped throughout the declension.² I have recorded the readings of the various MSS. in such cases, as the usage varies. When these two words are used freely they are declined as masc.; siol Éibhir, not siol nÉibhir. The predicate adj. governing a noun in the gen. is regularly followed by eclipsis.³ In such cases I have given the eclipsis if present in any copy, while recording variants.

Eclipsis after nách

Taking the MSS. in a mass I find that in the copies of these poems nách (dependent neg.) regularly eclipses c, f, t; rarely d; other consonants and vowels being unaffected. Good 17th cent. MSS. do not as a rule show eclipsis after nách, but the O'Conor Don MS. is fairly consistent in the usage described. I have regularly omitted this eclipsis in the text, but have usually recorded in the variants readings which show it.

³ See p. LXIX supra.

Eclipsis after ni, muna

This is very common in the MSS.; see Varr.

Exceptions

Only one exception to the general rules of eclipsis need be noticed here, that relating to gen. pl. preceding a proper name, in this case eclipsis is rarely shown in the MSS., and if absent in all copies I have not restored it in any instance. The usage seems to be fairly old, cf. e. g. i ré mac Aeda Sláine Met. Dinds. iii 148 (LL); sluagh Gall Átha Cliath FM 965.

Phonetic Mutation

In the cases of mutation noticed above the change is connected with the meaning of the affecting word; those now to be noticed are not connected with the meaning of the preceding form; the change is in some cases determined by the character of the word itself, without reference to what precedes; in others the final of the preceding word may sometimes prevent change. Most of the words affected are undeclinable forms:

cách is often lenited in the gen., without regard to preceding word: fala cháigh 2. 232; bioth slán cháich 17. 2. In some other instances the lenited form will be found amongst the variants, as in this point I have contented myself with following the best MS.; similarly with regard to the numerals ceithre, cóig, etc., which are often lenited, as in the spoken language. The pronominal forms of go (chugam etc.) and tar are regularly lenited.¹ The pronominal compounds of do, di, are regularly lenited after a vowel or -r; less regularly after -ch, -gh; rarely, and perhaps inadvertently, after d, n, t, l, s; when lenition is shown after -dh I have not as a rule given it in the text. The poss. m is often, but not regularly, lenited before a vowel. The simple prep. do, and the prep. + poss. dú are lenited in good MSS. when a vowel precedes; thall, thuaidh etc. are regular.

All those cases noted as regular in good MSS. have been retained in the text, and restored if absent from MSS.; in cases where the lenition is not frequent enough to be termed regular, I have followed the best MS. and recorded the variants.

VARIANTS

All essential divergences of each MS. copy from the text are recorded, whether these affect the sense or not, merely orthographical variants being usually ignored. When the variant only concerns the initial of a word, that is, when the object is to record a reading of lenition or non-lenition, eclipsis or non-eclipsis, only the first two or three letters of the word are given, with a period; e. g. if the text has ceann a variant cheann is given as ch.; a variant gceann as gc.

When two or more copies differ only in the spelling of a variant, I have not recorded the different spellings, but have included them under that of one of the copies cited; for example in a variant recorded as: "féchain EFG" F might have fíachuin; G fechoin. When good early copies are available I have not recorded metrically inadmissible readings from late and inaccurate MSS. When the text is constructed entirely from MSS. of this class even metrically inaccurate readings are usually recorded.

Division of words.

Certain adverbial phrases may be differently analysed, the division being made according to the metrical requirements in each case; e. g., araon, arís may be treated as a-raon, a-rís or ar-aon, ar-is, according as alliteration with r- or with a vowel is required. In the text I have not separated the proclitic syllable in such words, as the division would have been arbitrary when not decided by metre. According to the Ir. Gr. Tr. dáríribh alliterates only with r-, aríribh with vowels. See note on 17. § 60. Foreign proper names, when incompletely assimilated to Irish, and not stressed on the first syllable, are often treated in somewhat the same way as these phrases, e. g., in 17. 194 Oiluéarus 'Oliverus' is scanned as Oil Mhéarus, alliterating with mhac, but in 202 it must be scanned either Oil Uéarus or Oilbh Éarus, the second part alliterating either with Oil or Oilbh or with Uilliam. The first syllable probably has an independent stress, though we might expect it to be treated as an iairmbéarla 'proclitic.' Cf. A n-íuil go hOilevárus ag sin don tí thoigéarus (Ó Dhia dhealbhtar gach oige § 53), TCD F 4 r3, 26 a.¹

Use of hyphen

I have only used the hyphen before the tonic syllable of the deuterotonic forms of genuine compound verbs. Thus the syllable following it is always stressed. I have not inserted it between the constituents of nominal or adjectival compounds or between adjectival prefixes and verbal forms. There are two principal reasons for omitting the hyphen in these cases. Firstly there is an undesirable inconsistency involved in printing, e. g., do-nim beside cúl-chas, as in the first instance the hyphen divides a proclitic from a following stressed syllable; in the second the syllable preceding the hyphen bears the main stress. Secondly, the insertion of the hyphen would have presented difficulties in such a form as abhradonn (l. 102).² An arbitrary respelling would have solved this difficulty, but that is a thing to be avoided when possible. There are other objections to the indiscriminate use of the hyphen in nominal and adjectival compounds, but I need not deal with them here.

Sequence and titles of the poems

A chronological arrangement was not attempted, as even approximate dating is in most cases impossible. I have grouped the poems under the families addressed, and arranged the groups in an order corresponding to the relative importance and celebrity of the families at the period. It was difficult to decide whether O'Neill or O'Donnell was entitled to first place so I have ranged these two distinguished names in alphabetical order.

The titles of the poems are added by the editor. In the MSS. the poems have no heading save the author's name.

THE IRISH TEXTS SOCIETY was established in 1898 for the purpose of publishing texts in the Irish language, accompanied by such introductions, English translations, glossaries, and notes as may be deemed desirable.

The Annual Subscription (from 1st January, 1921*), is 12/6 (American subscribers, $3.25), payable on 1st January, on payment of which members will be entitled to receive, post free, the current volume or, at the option of the member, any one of the earlier volumes which may still be available. There is no entrance fee.

The payment of a single sum of £7 7s. Od. (colonial or foreign members £7 10s. Od.; American members 38 dollars), entitles to life membership. Life members will receive one copy of each volume issued subsequently to the receipt of this sum by the Society.

Vols. I., II. and III. are now out of print and others are rapidly becoming scarce. The ordinary sale price to non-members is 15/6 per volume (post free).

The Council makes a strong appeal to all interested in the preservation and publication of Irish Manuscripts to join the Society and to contribute to its funds, and especially to the Editorial Fund, which has been established for the remuneration of Editors for their arduous work.

IRISH TEXTS SOCIETY.

THE Twenty-second Annual Meeting of the Irish Texts Society was held on 22nd January, 1921, at 7 Brunswick Square, London, W.C.1.

Mr. R. Flower, Chairman of the Executive Council, presided.

The Minutes of the last Annual Meeting, held on 31st January, 1920, were taken as read. The Honorary Secretary read the

TWENTY-SECOND ANNUAL REPORT.

The Council are glad to report that despite protracted delays due to labour troubles in Ireland it was possible to publish during the Summer of 1920 both parts of "The Contentions of the Bards," edited by the Rev. Lambert McKenna, S.J., M.A. The work has been well received by the press and the two parts constituting volumes 20 and 21 of the Society's series have been despatched to members whose subscriptions were paid for the years 1918 and 1919.

The next work to be issued, viz., the Poems of Tadhg Dall O hUiggin, edited by Miss Eleanor Knott, the publication of which is anxiously awaited by Irish students and scholars, has been ready for the press for many months and the delay in issuing it is due to difficulties connected with the satisfactory settlement of contracts for printing and binding. The Poems will be issued in two volumes for the years 1920 and 1921. It is confidently anticipated that the first of these will be in the hands of members before the end of 1921.

The Poems of the O'Neills of Clannaboy, edited by Professor T. O'Donnchadha, are also completed, but before being sent to press certain portions of the work are being revised.

A prose romance edited by Miss Cecile O'Rahilly, M.A., has also been accepted for publication and will shortly be put in hand. The publication of this text will bring the number of the Society's volumes up to twenty-six, including the larger and small Irish-English Dictionaries.

Publication of the new and revised edition of the Society's larger dictionary compiled by the Rev. P. S. Dinneen, M.A., D.Litt., remains, however, the most absorbing and interesting work which the Council have at present on hands. As has already been several times reported, a large sum will be necessary to set this important national undertaking upon a secure basis. The Dictionary is intended not only to replace but to supersede and surpass the original work of which the stereo plates have been destroyed. Unfortunately, the appeals sent broadcast amongst members of this and kindred societies and of other selected bodies and persons reasonably supposed to be vitally interested in the publication of this most necessary work have not met with the response which the Council felt justified in anticipating. A limited number of supporters of the project have been exceedingly generous, but the great majority of students and teachers of the language as well as revivalists have evinced little interest in the work. No doubt, the long continued troubles in Ireland are militating against the success of the venture. Help in the form either of loans or donations has been solicited upon all sides, but the Council have not felt justified in spending a large sum upon an extensive advertising scheme at the rates now in force. The assistance of the Irish press is invoked to further the interests of this healthy national project. An occasional paragraph attracts widespread attention and serves to remind enthusiastic language revivalists of immediate and practical means of furthering the cause.

Up to the 31st December, 1920, there had been received in aid of the Dictionary Fund—donations £163, loans £640. Total £803. These figures represent the totals since the inception of the scheme, the actual amount received during the year 1920 being Donations £73, Loans £99, Total £172. The Council appeal once more, especially for donations from those who can afford to help the Society's work either in re-publishing the all important Dictionary which has long been out of print or in aid of the fund for the remuneration of the Editors of the ordinary volumes in whose meagre fees it has been impossible to make any increase in view of the changed economic conditions of late years. The smaller school edition of the Irish-English Dictionary still commands a fairly steady sale, but students of the language continue to be seriously handicapped pending the publication of the revised large edition.

It is with much regret that the Council are again compelled by the continued high costs of printing and binding to ask the Annual Meeting to sanction a further increase in the Membership Fees. The original annual subscription of 7/6 was maintained in force up to 31st December, 1920 (less than a month ago) and has entailed a loss on the year's working. The increase from 7/6 to 12/6 sanctioned last year comes into force for the first time this month, but the Hon. Treasurer and Council after careful consideration estimate that even the new subscription of 12/6 will not suffice to enable the Council to carry out its future programme which has been outlined above, and the following alterations are therefore proposed in Rule 9 to come into force on 1st January, 1922 (twelve months hence).

SUBSCRIPTION.

9.—The Annual Subscription from 1st January, 1922, shall be £1 * (American $5) per annum, entitling the Member to one copy (post free) of the volume published by the Society for the year, and giving the right to vote on all questions submitted to the General Meeting of the Society. The payment of a single sum of £12 12s. 0d. (Colonial or Foreign Members £13 0s. 0d., American $65) entitles to life membership. Life Members will receive one copy of each volume issued subsequently to the receipt of this sum by the Society.

* Amended after debate to £1 1s. 0d.

The published price of volumes to non-members from 1st January, 1922, will be increased from 15/6 to 25/-. Members whose subscriptions are still in arrears are earnestly requested as a result of this notice to adjust their accounts as soon as possible and thus save the Council the increased cost and trouble of sending out repeated reminders. Members whose sets of the volumes are incomplete are also reminded that the stock of many of the earlier books is running very low, and that three are out of print and the existing stock of a fourth is imperfect.

The Council have to record with sorrow the death last month of Mr. Samuel Boyle who held the office of Hon. Treasurer for sixteen years and who was ever an active and vigilant guardian of the Society's interests. The sudden and lamented death which also occurred last month of Mr. T. W. Rolleston, member of the Council for the past eleven years, was a grievous blow to his colleagues on the Council as well as a real loss to the Society. An expression of the sympathy of the Council has been conveyed to the relatives of Mr. Boyle and Mr. Rolleston.

On the motion to adopt the report an amendment to alter as from 1st January, 1922, the rate of annual subscription to £1 1s. 0d., moved by Mr. M. J. FitzGerald and seconded by Miss Eleanor Hull was carried by a majority of those present.

On the proposal of Dr. Crone, seconded by Miss Eleanor Hull, the report, as amended, was adopted.

The financial statement and balance sheet presented by Dr. England were adopted subject to audit on the proposal of Mr. James Buckley, M.R.I.A., seconded by the Rev. T. O'Sullivan.

It was at this stage found necessary to adjourn the meeting.

At an adjourned meeting held on Tuesday, 15th February, 1921, the balance sheet, duly audited, was presented.

To fill a vacancy it was resolved that the name of Mr. A. Martin Freeman be added to the Council.

The re-election of the outgoing members of the Council, Mrs. Banks and Mr. T. D. FitzGerald, was carried on the proposal of Miss Eleanor Hull, seconded by Dr. England.

The re-election of Professor Douglas Hyde as President of the Society, and the election of Miss Eleanor Hull and Mr. T. D. FitzGerald as Joint Honorary Secretaries, and of Dr. England as Hon. Treasurer, were carried unanimously on the proposal of Mr. Charlton B. Walker, seconded by Mr. O'Carroll.

On the proposal of Mr. Charlton B. Walker, seconded by the Rev. T. O'Sullivan, the appointment of Mr. R. W. Farrell, F.L.A.A., as auditor subject to annual confirmation according to Rule 17, was carried. A hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Farrell for auditing the accounts on the present occasion.

Sixty-three new members have joined the Society since 31st January, 1920, the date of the previous Annual Meeting; their names are included in the subjoined list of members.

Seven additional new members joined as Life Members, and six of the ordinary members became Life Members during the year.

There are now 32 Life Members of the Society and about 350 ordinary members. The following three members have resigned their membership:—Mr. J. W. Jeudwine, LL.B.; Very Rev. Canon Norris; P. J. Lynch, M.R.I.A.

We regret to report the decease of the undermentioned five members:—Mrs. O'Kinealy, Honorary Life Member; Mr. Samuel Boyle, Hon. Treasurer; Mr. T. W. Rolleston, a Member of the Council, Rev. Father O Griobhtha, Galway, and Mr. John Conaghan, Gortahork, Co. Donegal.

Since the date of Annual Meeting twenty-one new ordinary members and three life members have joined the Society.

T. A. ENGLAND, Hon. Treasurer.

The undersigned, having had access to all the Books and Accounts of the Society, and having examined the foregoing statements and verified them with the Books, Deeds and Documents, etc., relating thereto, now signs the same as found to be correct.

ROBERT W. FARRELL, F.L.A.A.,
Certified Accountant.

12th February, 1921.

In addition to the Assets shown in the Balance Sheet the Society possesses a large number of Volumes, 3,750 bound and 5,280 unbound. It has not been possible to get a correct estimate of the value of this stock in time to include such in the balance sheet, but it is hoped next year to be able to do so.

NEW IRISH BOOKS.

DUANAIRE NA GAEDHILGE, by Rose M. Young.

An anthology of the most exquisite folk lyrics of Ireland—the "Golden Treasury" of the Gael.

These poems are not the productions of the artificial, rule-bound highbrows of the 16th and 17th centuries; they are of the people, by the people, for the people; and they depict the life, the hopes, the fears, the joys, the sorrows of the Gael, with a quaint, winning, natural simplicity beyond the reach of art.

The book is exhaustively annotated, and there is a vocabulary of unusual words. Cloth, 4/- nett.

NEW BOOKS BY PROFESSOR O'RAHILLY.

The Educational Company will also shortly publish two new books by Professor T. F. O'Rahilly, of Trinity College, Dublin.

DANFHOCAIL.—A Collection of rare and interesting Quatrains.
